A Good Big Clock
For Very Little Money

EVERY EXHIBITOR Should have a GOOD clock next to the screen. Should subscribe for a GOOD trade paper.

The Moving Picture News

Having made a favorable arrangement with one of the largest clock companies in this country, can now offer to its readers a Regular Eight Day Clock, 38½ inches high, with a 12-inch dial, and a subscription to the Moving Picture News for one year for $4.45.

This clock is first-class in every respect and would cost you a great deal more than the price we charge you for both the clock and subscription combined.

The offer is good for old or new subscribers, and is offered for a limited period to show you how you can get two GOOD articles for a small outlay, and you need both.

REMIT BY CHEQUE OR POST OFFICE MONEY ORDER

NOTE:—As three of these clocks can be forwarded by freight at the same cost as one only (the three weighing under 100 lbs.), it will pay you to send in three subscriptions for one delivery to the same freight office at $4.45 each and divide the freight cost.

Each clock is packed in a wooden case, f.o.b. at the factory, Forestville, Conn., weight 30 lbs. Have your local agent advise you just what the freight charges will be.

WILL YOU SIGN THIS DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

In the course of film events, exhibitors should realize that their patrons are not interested in motion picture politics —that they are interested in seeing good pictures. Your patrons don't care which side of the political fence you are on, but they do care what pictures they see. Should you show poor pictures, they won't, in revenge, steal your children, but they will reduce your receipts by going round the corner to other exhibitors. The Gaumont Company makes pictures that the people want. That's our business.

To-day show your independence of everything but merit by ordering all Gaumont releases.

A FORECAST

WHAT will the year bring forth? is a question agitating the minds of many in the industry. Will it be progress and advancement or retrogression? That it can be both, relies largely upon the individual. We think if he is honestly pushing the wares he has for sale, and those wares are films of high-class quality, it may be advanced, or the reverse, it may retreat. The market is open for the best. The market is ready for the cleanest and the keenest intellects. I do not think I shall be far wrong if I make the statement that 1913 will see the greatest advance in the art that it has ever done during the past thirteen years.

The feature film will become one of the principal items of merchandise, and depending upon the quality of the feature film, so will the people receive good or bad impressions of the industry. As a whole I am fully of the opinion that instead of the Censorship Board censoring the films in future, this will be done by the scenario editor, who will eliminate and return all false Indian, cowboy, Jesse James murders, the triangular rubbish, and such like paltry stolen ideas to their writers and the need of a censorship will be no more. Does the press need censoring for the pictures it puts in? And while on the subject of the press, I think that instead of the yellow journals writing such scare headlines as they do against the moving picture, it would be better if they eliminated from their own columns the gruesome details of the gambling and the vice investigations.

I am of the opinion that this has done more to demoralize, during the last two months in New York City, the minds of the young readers than has the moving picture done during its whole existence, and if some of the namby pamby religionists, who are trying to eke out a living by their wits, would turn those self-same wits to the purging of the stories in the press, it would do them more good than belittling the pictures. Then again, if it is only possible to impress upon the minds of the story writers that good clean stories are wanted, without any murders, holdups or stabbings, they would soon be able to create a standard for themselves; if there is no supply there will be no demand.

During the coming year the amateur photographer will be more in evidence throughout the country, taking choice little scenes with a Cinematograph camera suitable to his pocket and his requirements, and when a home machine is manufactured that is of real value, I think a greater demand will be made upon the theatres for good pictures. The lot of the exhibitors will be made very much easier, and the great inequalities under which he has been working and existing will have passed away through the National League, which during the coming year will be the most important feature in the industry, and any censorship necessary for the films will go through them as they know their requirements better than anyone outside the moving picture ranks does, and, further than that, they can act as an authoritative body by requesting their members not to exhibit films which they censor or reject, and by so doing will purge their own ranks and make them clean.

The educational departments will advance by leaps and bounds, obtaining for themselves films suitable for their work. Already signs are visible, and the sounds are heard that an educational exchange, or exchanges, will be opened for the sole purpose of supplying schools and colleges with the best equipped films it is possible to procure, selected from the European and American catalogues, and when these are an accomplished fact, I am fully convinced that the educationalists alone will not be the users of these subjects, but that the public will also demand some one or two of these special subjects to be interspersed in an evening's entertainment.

To enumerate the various subjects of educational value will take up too much space, but glancing through the back files of the Moving Picture News, readers will be able to select a program for their needs. A new American film will be placed on the market during the early part of the year. A non-inflammable film of American make, I understand, is also to be available in a very short time, and last but not least, the photography is very much improving and when America can equal and excel the foreign photographers very little will remain in the progression of the art.

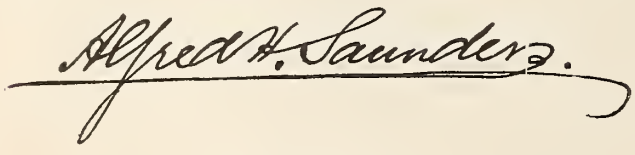
IS THE NEWS FOR SALE?

OPENING my mail of December 27th, there was a letter bearing the following remarks: "Your 'friends' of '——' are spreading a report that the News is for sale at $1,500. It has even reached my ears. If you do sell out I wish you would give me advance notice so that I can be first in the field to purchase. However, this story sounds to me like another malicious lie. Is the News for sale?"

A day or two previous to this I received a letter from a Chicago firm asking the same question and offering to purchase the News. A day or two previous to that there came a query from Cleveland asking the same question and offering to purchase it for $7,500. During the past week a friend stopped me on the street and asked if there was any truth in the rumor that I was disposing of the Moving Picture News. He was willing to give me $10,000 for all the rights, privileges, etc., it carried. I replied it was not for sale.

All I can say in regard to the above false, malicious statement is the fact "an enemy hath done this," and for what purpose I utterly fail to understand. The News is read and looked up to too much by the exhibitors from every part of the United States. It is valued too much by others in the industry. The subscriptions are coming in in wonderfully voluminous numbers, our advertisers are getting good results when they advertise only in our columns. The News is looked upon as being the most forward paper the world over, as correspondence from every quarter of the globe will prove. Educators and legislators are looking forward to every issue of the paper so that I may say, and say most emphatically, the News is not for sale.

The News has a well defined policy before it, and in a very little while will be the mouthpiece of the whole trade in this country and largely abroad. The policy of the paper is straightforwardness, a square deal to the exhibitor and the operator. No member of the staff on the News is allowed to write advertisements and waste their time in offices of film companies, receiving graft and specializing against other papers, nor are its employees adopting blackmailing tactics wherein if money is not given to write up a certain film and one or two pages of advertisements do not follow, the result is a condemnation of the film or films in question. If there is anything worth writing about in the industry the News does it freely, openly, and above board, and expresses its opinion in a straightforward honorable manner. It is such a paper as this the exhibitors require, and if the manufacturers are short-sighted enough to jeopardize their own interests that is their lookout, for which I care nothing, but I will fearlessly speak as I think, and as I see, upholding the quality of the film and seeking the true elevation of a grand and glorious industry. Again I say the Moving Picture News is not for sale.



Berlin's finest and newest Cinematograph playhouse, the Nollendorf Theatre, which is about to open its doors, is the creation and property of two Americans, the Messrs. Goldsoll and Kinsella. The building, which is like a Greek temple, is architecturally one of the most striking structures in the Kaiser's capital.

The new theatre contains one feature which is an absolute novelty in German motion picture houses, namely, that it does not require to be darkened while the films are being shown. Its domed roof is also an innovation, as it is built to be removed in summer and during other propitious weather, that at night the spectators have the sky above them.

WHAT OF MAYOR GAYNOR'S VIEWS OF CENSORSHIP?

Unfortunately, the general report of the hearing of the Folks ordinance—with Alderman Dowling's amendment—which took place before Mayor Gaynor in the Aldermanic Chamber on Tuesday, December 24, at 11 a. m., did not appear in our last issue, on account of the inability, through illness of the writer, to prepare it. For that reason we will not dwell on the detailed proceedings of the meeting, which have already been discussed at length in the daily newspapers but with the matter of the censorship of the pictures, which clause added to the ordinance has been the cause of so much discussion and diversity of opinion.

The fears voiced by Mayor Gaynor that should any sort of an official censorship be established, serious interference might occur with the liberty of the people, free speech and a free press, with which evils our forefathers struggled and conquered, though not securely founded, may not be entirely without grounds.

The question of censorship in any case is a large one. Applied to moving pictures, it has the peculiar position of having to deal with an art as well as an industry, and the moral temperament of a recreation.

The moral temperament of a recreation where boys and girls are concerned is of large significance; the image is only in its development, the muscles of the moral nature are not yet reinforced; the mind is still an open book, with pages scarcely written upon, and itself of the sensitiveness of a photographic film. What the eye sees the mind rarely forgets.

This is why the censorship clause in the Folks ordinance should remain there. This is the reason why the ordinance should be passed by Mayor Gaynor intact.

With regard to the Board of Education taking care of the censorship of motion pictures, having under their jurisdiction the education of the children of the city, does it not seem right and proper that if there is to be a censorship imposed on motion pictures at all, they should be the ones best fitted to supervise it?

Someone has hinted that should the censorship of motion pictures become a matter of authority or law, such films as "Hamlet" or "Rip Van Winkle" might be barred. This seems a poorly grounded fear, if the choosing of the censors be wisely conducted. No man or woman should be allowed to censor art who is not thoroughly conversant with art. Art is never vulgar. The nudeness of art bears with it the purity of heaven. When it comes to a matter of art, what is good for a man is good for a child, or vice versa.

There is another point of censorship which has not yet been touched. The manufacturer, in a sense, fears censorship; he feels that an unfair advantage is being taken of him after he has expended perhaps thousands of dollars in a production. Could not more satisfaction be obtained all around by establishing a regular bureau of censorship of motion picture scenarios, with artists, literati, philanthrophists, etc., sitting in judgment on the selected scenarios of the different manufactories?

The passing of the Folks ordinance with or without the censorship clause, but preferably with, would be of infinite benefit to the industry and its exponents, the motion picture exhibitors, who would thereby be governed by a centralized authority, and from whose often innocent shoulders, in a large measure, the burden of unjust persecution would be taken.

SPECIAL SCENES INCIDENT TO THE MIKADO'S FUNERAL

The General Film Publicity and Sales Company have just received 500 feet of film in which is presented some of the most interesting scenes of the funeral of the great Mikado, including the ancient Shinto rites.

The Japanese Mikado, who entered his royal position in 1868, at the age of fifteen, and died in September, 1912, was the head of 65,000,000 people and gave away during his lifetime, for charity and philanthropic purposes, some $10,000,000. Nogi, who gave his life as a sacrifice of sorrow at the death of the Mikado, is also seen in this film.

Mr. Spanuth is now completing negotiations with managers and a number of famous theatrical stars for some remarkable work in the near future.

MARSHALL P. WILDER

Interviewed by M. I. MacDonald

It is a remarkable thing how few of us find opportunity to demonstrate and make profitably useful the talents with which nature has endowed us. It is astounding how many of us find little to be thankful for, and plenty to complain of. The real pathos comes in the adornment of the cheek with the bloom of health, the girding of the loins with the strength of Samson, and withal the failure to stimulate the dormant powers of mind and intellect.

No more striking example of the predominance of mind over matter could be imagined than is exemplified in the case of Marshall P. Wilder, one of the greatest humorists, not only of America, but of the world. Devoid of colossal physical strength, and in truth, all but absent in the body, this remarkable man has made his presence felt over the entire globe in his ability to entertain his fellowmen. He has made men laugh the whole world round. Like the meteor that flashes through the clear cool sky of an autumn night, he leaves wherever he goes a trail of light—a sparkling belt of mirth.

And lo, he steps even upon the picture screen, and another bubble of God's effervescent sunshine is immortalized for coming generations.

The Biograph some years ago took advantage of the wonderful pantomimic powers of Marshall P. Wilder when he was persuaded to pose for them in a pantomimic study entitled, "Reading a Letter," and which effort was most successful. Several years then elapsed ere he again turned his thoughts pictureward with any serious intent, and it was but one year ago that the Vitagraph Company sought his services in a series of moving pictures, when he entered into a contract with them which, by-the-way, expired the month of December, 1912. Marshall P. Wilder is now at liberty to engage with some other picture firm that may be desirous of employing the wonderful and versatile ability of the great American humorist.

"I am so sorry to leave the Vitagraph Company," said Mr. Wilder in an interview. "It has been one of the pleasantest years of my life. We were all like one big family at the studio, and it is with regret that I leave them."

Being known to the world as a humorist, it may be news to some of our readers to know that Marshall P. Wilder is able to adapt his talents in the most marvelously impressive manner to a certain style of drama specially suited to his unique personality. One of his most successful attempts is portrayed in "The Cobbler," one of the series of ten or twelve pictures in which he appeared for the Vitagraph. "The Cobbler" is portrayed in a story of the Silas Marner type, and the film is one of the most tremendously effective of the kind ever produced.

The following quotation from a short sketch of the career of Mr. Wilder may prove of interest to readers:

"Marshall Pinckney Wilder was born in Geneva, New York, September 19, 1859, son of Doctor Louis de Valois Wilder. When one year old he was taken to New York City, which has been his home ever since, with the exception of short periods of residence in the cities of Rochester, N. Y., and Hartford, Conn. Owing to physical disability his education was very limited, the whole of his school life being covered by three or four years consisting of short terms in the public schools of Rochester, Hartford and New York. Even the short time given to school was not spent very profitably, as more time was given to mischief and making the other children laugh than was devoted to his studies. He was alternately the pride and despair of his teachers; the pride being for his ability in elocution, when he could move the whole school to tears or laughter; their despair being when he designed some mischief that upset all discipline. The gift of elocution was entirely natural as he has never had an hour's instruction.

"His first business enterprise was peddling, when he went from door to door with a basket, selling little articles useful to housewives. His first position was at Oakland Beach, where he was put in charge of the storeroom and bowling alleys.

"After that he entered Bradstreet's Commercial Agency as file boy, at a salary of $2.00 a week. As at school, more time was spent here amusing the other clerks than attending to business. While here he first used his abilities to entertain, as a business commodity, charging fifty cents a night. Finally the entertainments became so frequent, the price rising as the demand grew, that he found it expedient to leave Bradstreet's and devote all his time to entertaining. In 1883 he went to London, where he leaped into instant popularity, being taken up by the Prince of Wales, afterward King Edward VII, and the nobility and aristocracy. This achievement insured him even greater fame in America, as Anglomania was at its height, and he was the first American entertainer to go to London and make a reputation. He took the condition at floodtide and rode in on the topmost wave. Most of his success has been due to his business ability and shrewd judgment of character. He has always conducted his own affairs, never having employed a manager, and depending on no Lyceum nor agencies to make his engagements.

"After holding the position of foremost American platform entertainer for twenty years, revisiting London every summer, following the trend of events, he entered vaudeville in 1899. His success in this line of work has been and is still unquestioned.

"In 1903 he married Miss Sophia Cornell Hanks, of Brooklyn. In 1904-05, with Mrs. Wilder, he made a trip around the world giving entertainments before enthusiastic audiences in Japan, China, Ceylon and Egypt.

"His eldest child, a daughter, Grace Isabel Wilder, was born in July, 1905, and a son, Marshall P. Wilder, Jr., in September, 1906.

"He has done considerable journalistic work, having been associated with many prominent newspapers, and is the author of three books—"People I've Smiled With," "The Sunny Side of the Street," and "Smiling 'Round the World."

"His career has been attended by continued success, and an association with the famous people of the world that is unique in its varied history."

Wonderfully magnetic is the face of this big little man. His own definition of magnetism hits very near the point, and explains why, when you meet and converse with Marshall P. Wilder, you are conscious only of the bright, expressive face of the humorist.

Says Mr. Wilder, "When you meet a man on the street the the first thing you notice about him is his hat—his whole appearance is affected by the style of hat he wears. Next you notice whether he has a clean collar or not, then his cuffs and his boots, and the very last thing that you notice about him is the suit of clothes that he wears. In other words your first impression centers around the head. If you notice the light at the top of a lighthouse you will see the birds flocking about it. You have there one demonstration of magnetism—the birds are attracted to it by the light, the brightness and warmth of the lighthouse lamp. You see two women, one is very beautiful to look at, the other much less beautiful. The former you love to look at, but the latter you feel like taking to your heart. You are attracted to her—everyone runs to do her bidding. This is a larger demonstration of magnetism."

Finally after expounding for several minutes on the question, Mr. Wilder gave as his definition of magnetism the following: "The requirements of personal magnetism are first passion, then affection, impulsiveness and sensitiveness."

During his travels and work of entertaining Mr. Wilder has gathered together probably the largest collection of autographed photographs in the possession of any one person. It is said that at his summer home at Atlantic City he has a collection of some three thousand photographs accompanied by autograph letters from the great personages of the period.

A special cablegram to The New York Times and Public Ledger conveys an item of especial interest:

The Kaiser is the latest recruit to the growing ranks of film show enthusiasts. He has had a motion piction theatre built in the Potsdam palace and dedicated it with a performance for the benefit of a distinguished company of military and political guests.

A number of films exhibited were of recent events wherein the Kaiser himself participated, including a royal hunt given in honor of the Archduke Franz Ferdinand of Austria, near Hanover.

The Cinematograph industry is so grateful to the Kaiser for his imperial patronage that it has just issued a handsome volume called "The Kaiser on Film" as a Christmas book which is also intended to commemorate his Majesty's silver jubilee in 1913.

The book is handsomely gotten up, with reproductions of motion pictures, showing the Kaiser in the midst of all his varied activities.

The text discloses the fact that the Kaiser first became interested in motion pictures during one of his recent summer cruises abroad the Hohenzollern to the North Cape. He caught the court photographer, who always travels with him, making motion snapshots one day, and when they were reproduced on film aboard the yacht the same night the Kaiser at once became a confessed "fan," and ever since has posed cheerfully under all sorts of circumstances for the men working moving picture cameras.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

That the photo-reporter has far eclipsed his fellow scribe has been amply demonstrated by the series of films being offered by the Feature Film Manufacturing Company, of Washington, D. C., on the Panama Canal. It is not so much the wonderful engineering work that gives to these pictures their greatest importance, but the fact that they film the official inspection tour of President Taft and party, which left Washington December 19 to return on December 31. With special privileges, L. J. Simons, camera man of the Feature Film Manufacturing Company, accompanied the President's party, following these officials in all their movements throughout the entire trip. No subject can be of greater interest to the American public and the world at large. Every nation is now looking to the Panama Canal, not only as a great engineering feat, but as a waterway that will mark an epoch in the commercial world. "The meeting of the waters," as the monster lock is well termed, is minutely filmed. The grand military pageant, the first of its kind in Panama, passes in review, natives and Americans taking part. Festivities of various kinds have been caught in the camera in a most attractive manner. In all of this, be it remembered, President Taft figures.

These films chronicle the events of this trip in a more lasting and more vivifying way than is possible in any newspaper. No words will be necessary; the pictures tell the whole story. This is the age of visualization; this is the age of "show me." The moving picture camera has become the historian of the times and the Panama Canal is an important event in history.

As the moving picture exhibitor is fast becoming as important a factor in his town as the newspaper editor, he cannot afford to ignore educational, topical and historical films. Since the Panama Canal series offered by the Feature Film Manufacturing Company possesses all these elements, the moving picture patrons will demand this exhibition. In order to have this news as fresh as possible, these will be ready for the market by January 6, five days after the finish of the tour.

In addition to the official importance that the films will present, they also furnish a graphic picture of native life in the Canal Zone, of tropical scenery, as well as life on the battleship en route to and from Panama. Mr. Simons has been accorded many special privileges in securing these views and they therefore possess an individuality that makes them unique. No feature offered to the exhibitor has caused greater interest in the industry nor will give greater pleasure to the moving picture patrons than these Panama films.

During the past year close on to $600,000 has been expended in Detroit on theatre buildings, and plans already made for theatres to be built during the early months of the coming year will bring the amount up to a cool million.

Most of these theatres are devoted to vaudeville and moving pictures.

THE WHITE GLOVE BAND

(Gaumont States Right Feature)

Another thrilling special comes from the Gaumont studios in Paris. Of the Gaumont States rights features which have thus far appeared, "The White Glove Band" is, perhaps, the most gripping. The photographic skill displayed in this film is superb. The most stirring scenes of the story are laid in the cafes of Paris, an Apache den, and the bandits' lair. The following is a short synopsis of the story:

"Lord Croze," leader of the White Glove Band, who has adopted the title to gain entree to fashionable social gatherings, persuades his intimate, an actress, Madame Claire Simonette, to join the band and to act as a decoy in entrapping Declerim Bey. Ladeux, a police inspector, disguised as the Egyptian, meets the principal members of the band and becomes interested in the fair actress, whose nom de guerre in her new environs of crime is Nina.

Nina is equally interested, and, on leaving Declerim Bey, passes a restless night under the potencies of this new passion, and on the following evening, when she and Bey were to have met her accomplices, she telephones to the ringleader, saying that she had received a message from Bey, saying that the latter could not keep his appointment with "Lord Croze," and that the engagement has been postponed. She concludes by saying that she is engaged for the evening.

This arouses the suspicions of the band's leader, and he goes to the apartment of Nina accompanied by his followers, and Ladeaux is discovered and carried off to the haunts of the bandits. He is released from the hands of the White Glove Band through the strategy of Nina, who has determined to free him at any cost. The finale of the picture shows the bandits and Nina being handed over to the police, with the understanding between Ladeaux and Nina that she will be released shortly, and that they will be united in their love.

A distinguished lead came in over the stork route and is the first acquisition of his type since the advent of the company of the "Flying A" at Santa Barbara. He is a lusty and robust little action of ten and one-quarter avoirdupois and bids fair to excel all possible competition. Chick Morrison, his father is more like the boos of the ranch than ever, and he certainly has every reason to be, for the time being at least, until we hear from the other benedicts at the "Flying A" studios.

The year 1912 was particularly productive for the matchmakers in the American Company. Wedding bells sounded some five or six times during the year, but Pauline Bush, Jessalyn Van Trump, Kerrigan, Richardson and the other leads are still enjoying the single blessedness.

ST. LOUIS, MO.—Famous Feature Film Co.; capital stock, $10,000. Incorporators, G. Wagner, Nathan Steinberg, Lester Harburger; to do general moving picture business.

KANSAS CITY, MO.—A theatre building will be erected in the neighborhood of the high school. Jno. G. M'att is receiving bids. Cost $40,000.

IN THE DEN OF LIONS

(Great Northern Special)

One of the most remarkable pictures of the kind ever marketed in America is the Great Northern special release entitled "In the Den of Lions." In this film almost the entire workings of a European circus are demonstrated from the business offices downward. The story is put in the form of a drama. The lion tamer is in love with a tight-rope walker, who is already the wife of one of the chief acrobats. At the persistent repulsions of the woman the lion tamer becomes enraged and plans all sorts of ill schemes to induce her to give him her love.

During the exciting events of the story an immense python escapes and is found in the room of the woman lying on the couch beside her little child. This scene is tremendously thrilling, showing the woman snatching the huge monster from the couch and carrying it without.

Also some very clever work is accomplished with lions, which the accompanying cut illustrates.

This film has many points of interest apart from those set forth here, and is not only a study in human nature, but in animal life as well.

The picture acquires its title from the fact that the tight-rope walker, as a headliner to bring in more money for the firm, is compelled to do her turn with the rope suspended directly above the den of lions, into which she falls through her intense fear. She is rescued, however, by the assistant of the lion tamer.

The photographic work in this production is exceedingly good, and it is thoroughly commendable in all its parts.

F. W. HOCHSTETTER TO MAKE CROSS-CONTINENT TOUR WITH M. P. CAMERA

Mr. F. W. Hochstetter, president of the Hochstetter Utility Company, is expected to leave for the coast in a few days, over the line of the Great Northern Railroad. Mr. Hochstetter is taking with him a company and they will make a tour from Portland, Me., to Portland, Oregon. While away Mr. Hochstetter will make a number of productions, which will be put on the market in the same elaborate manner as characterized the Hochstetter Utility Company's production of the "Life of John Bunyan," and his classic allegory, "Pilgrim's Progress." Imitation being the sincerest form of flattery, the Hochstetter Company is indebted to a number of big producers, and in their endorsement of the original idea introduced by the Hochstetter Company of symphonic music in connection with cinematography.

NEW YORK, N. Y.—The old Ketaltas mansion at corner Second avenue and Eighth street will be made over into a moving picture theatre at cost of $20,000. Samuel Augenblick Co., manager; B. W. Levitan, architect.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

The "Triangle Plot"

UPON how many occasions has the editor of this department beaten the tom-tom of warning against the "triangle plot" and the problem playlet? Echo answers many a slam. His notes of remonstrance and caution have been directed equally to the director and the picture playwright. The crime plot is easy to evolve and is easily produced. The doubtful story is occasionally tempting and the divorce problem plot too frequent. There is a wave of sentiment sweeping over the country against the crime story and the suggestive plot. We repeat to the script writer, because you visit the theatre and see such pictures on the screen is no argument that you should rush off home and try and do likewise. Be clean, uplifting and chegrful in your work. Look on the bright side of life. There are too many shadows without you casting another into the aggregate. Elimination of the divorce problem and the "triangle plot" from the drama as a step to improving the morality of the stage was suggested by Cardinal Farley and other members of the National Catholic Theatre Movement at a recent conference. Cardinal Farley discussed the "evil influence of the modern stage," and said parents must hurry a movement toward creating a sentiment against bad plays. "In the kind of plays we attack we must pick out the so-called problem plays," he said. "The patently vulgar and crime plays are bad enough, but those that deal with the sex problem are the most dangerous. They weaken the teachings of childhood, they put evil in the minds of the young, and they lessen the sanctity of marriage vows. Many of the divorces in this country, are, in my mind, due to ideas gathered by young persons from problem plays. The theatre, in ages when the miracle and mystery plays had the vogue, was a place of instruction and beneficial amusement. We should return to that kind." Cardinal Farley was referring to the standard drama. His note of warning is also applicable, to a certain extent, to the picture play. The time has arrived when the doubtful and the overly sensational script should be declined by the manufacturers. They will very shortly be taboo, or we miss our guess. The picture playwright should aid in the process of elimination.

The Eclair Policy

The Eclair Company is noted for its tasteful releases, and we have noticed a care to the sub-titles in Eclair pictures that proves painstaking editorial work of an appealing nature. This cannot be said of some other companies. We recently received an appreciated letter from the efficient editor of Eclair in which that company's policy is outlined. The Eclair editor plays no favorites and it is the merit of the scripts which count in that editorial department. He is impersonal to contributors hence we shall not intrude on the editorial policy and mention his name. His letter:

> Your inquiry as to the needs of the Eclair Company received. What we do not need would have been the more simple, easier query to have answered. The Eclair Company has just established a Western studio upon the "Pawnee Bill" ranch, located at Pawnee City, Oklahoma. For this company we are at present in urgent need of good, brisk Western comedy subjects, with an occasional drama. No dramatic scripts will be considered—all comedies must be typically Western in atmosphere—cowboys, Indians, etc. The Fort Lee studio is desirous of any out-of-the-ordinary scenarios. They must be absolutely American and preferably modern as to time. We want stories which are plainly possible of actual happening. We want them logical. We want ideas that will lend themselves to expression in physical demonstration. We believe that leaders, inserts, sub-titles, etc., will improve almost any picture play, but we do not want to tell our story that way. We want them to be an embellishment rather than a necessity. We do not demand an extraordinary plot, but we do insist upon the author having a distinctive method of development. For instance, give two trained writers the same plot idea and both will make it into two practically different and distinct stories, so far as general appreciation is concerned. There are no real plots possible—that is, speaking from the point of basic elements—but it is possible for the accomplished writer to make any of them seem new to the average public. That is what we want.

The Logical Story

The statement of editorial needs of Eclair is a masterpiece of comprehensive brevity. The writer covers a wide range of essentials in a few significant words. "We want stories that are plainly possible of actual happening. We want them logical." The trouble is that the majority of stories submitted to film companies are not logical nor true to life. When you elaborate your idea endeavor to study out just what you and your friends would do in a like situation, and then put it down. Do not believe that just because you have an idea that any old development will do. Develop it naturally with a view to the logical actions and emotions of everyday people, and then you will come near the logical realism that Eclair and every other script editor longs for.

A Letter and a Manuscript

Yesterday we received a letter and a manuscript. To both were attached a name which is a household word in the thousands of homes which subscribe for and read several of the better-class magazines. The letter in part read: "What is the matter with these 'boobs' who pose as scenario editors? As you know, my fiction finds a place in any magazine in this country. Here's a scenario, my first, and called 'Her Only Love.' It has been turned down by three of these so-called editors. The editor of ———— Magazine says it would make a good picture play. What do you think about it?"

Now this author is personally a "good fellow" and professionally world-famous as a writer. But his script was impossible. The plot was a direct inspiration from Poe's "Fall of the House of Usher" and our friend took about 3,500 words to tell an old story. Some of the fiction stars are too prone to depreciate the literary abilities of picture-play editors. Pictureplay editors are trained men in their line of work and a majority of them are as well read as our author friend or the magazine editor who seems to not know it all about script writing. The three script editors who read this literary star's script noticed the origin of the plot just as quickly as we. They naturally concluded that they were better equipped by training to adapt script from Poe than the writer in question, and could see no reason why they should pay out good money to this man just because his name appears so frequently in the monthly magazines. When will magazine editors and writers come to appreciate that script writing is just as difficult an art as short story writing? When they do, and when they appreciate that the script editors are just as wise and capable in their line of literary work as the others are supposed to be, then will there arrive a better understanding. The magazine writer must study and work to succeed in pictureplay writing, just as the pictureplay writer must obtain a knowledge of short story writing. The two branches are separate and distinct, although somewhat peculiarly related. And it should afford the more humble writer encouragement to appreciate that it is not the name that counts in script writing. It is the "goods" that are considered.

The Real Trouble

"You would be surprised to see some of the names attached to scripts we received," remarked a script editor to us recently. "Some of them are names associated in the minds of the public with the highest forms of literature. Poets, for instance. I don't know much about poetry myself, but I guess they must write the real stuff, for they seem to be all of a quake for fear somebody will find out they are trying to earn an honest dollar or two catering to the film editors. We have the choicest assortment of fictitious names to be used in case we accept these scenarios you ever heard of. They need not sit up nights worrying. We don't get many good ones from these writers. The trouble is that if they have an idea that's worth anything they can't bear to part with it to a film maker. They save it up, thinking they may use it for a short story or novel. They think they can dash off a story that is too weak to be used anywhere else, and that's where they are wrong."

And then, on the other hand, there is the impossible script sent in by the writer who cannot even properly use the English language. Many scripts written without rudimentary knowledge reminds us of the following literary repartee:

Miss Literary—Are you very fond of Bacon, Mr. Saphead?

Mr. Saphead—Ya-as, especially in the morning with eggs.

No Cause for Worry

The Saturday Evening Post recently printed a gruesome story called "The Belled Buzzard." The Western Vitagraph Company almost simultaneously produced a play by William E. Wing in which use was made of vultures as birds of omen. Details in both stories were somewhat similar. The Vitagraph Company is protecting itself in advance against any possible charges of plagiarism. There is no cause for worry. Two years ago we used the same idea in feature stories to several newspapers and the caption of one or more of our stories was "The Belled Buzzard." To add to the coincidence, there is really a "Belled Buzzard." The bird with a sleighbell tied around one foot makes its annual appearance in a certain section of this country. The Saturday Evening Post writer and Mr. Wing probably gained their ideas from the newspaper stories. We claim to have discovered the "Belled Buzzard" and to have written the first story. We have no objection to the Saturday Evening Post or Vitagraph using the idea. Therefore there is no cause for Director Sturgeon's worries.

Perhaps You've Noticed

Perhaps you have noticed that we have no mention of the festive "Schools for Picture Playwrights" in the Department this week. Well, we checked off for variety, but next week——.

CHICAGO

To operate a theatre within the exclusive circumference of the loop district of Chicago, which is the very centre of the business-throbbing heart of this great trading municipality, one must, as the managers say, "produce the goods," which means produce everything pertaining to the showhouse as near up to the minute as money and ingenuity can secure—music, performers, films, picture machine, operator and uniformed assistants—in fact, from the artistic electrically-emblazoned front which at night rivals the face of Old Sol on a cloudless summer noonday, to the red-lighted bulbs inside, denoting the many places of exit.

One of the places fully filling the bill in all its exacting details is the Casino Gardens, 58 West Madison street. This playhouse has successfully been daily and nightly pleasing vast throngs of both merchants and passing transients in this moving, pushing spot, for about four years, employing two machine operators—a day and a night man. All who are conversant at all with the moving picture business know that an operator must be an exceptionally good one to hold down a job in Chicago for even one year; but here in the Casino are two members of Chicago Operators' Union No. 2, one of whom has regularly manipulated the machine in that theatre ever since it first opened its doors, namely, Mr. Fred Havill. His partner and relief is Mr. George Heise, both favorites in and outside the booth. "Please state," said Mr. Havill, "that we get our fine curtain results on a 'Simplex.'"

* * * *

Mr. Guy Morville, the popular erstwhile manager of the New Boston Theatre, on Clark Street; the Boston, on Madison, and the Boston Oyster House Cabaret, in the Boston Oyster House, Clark and Madison, a few weeks ago was relieved of all these responsibilities and was succeeded by Mr. Braddock. Mr. Morville, so his host of loyal friends feared, left Chicago for good and were correspondingly grieved, though Mr. Braddock is also quite a popular gentleman. Mr. Morville's army of friends in Chicago will be delighted to know that he is again back on the old job, conducting the destinies of the Madison street house and the Cabaret, and that Mr. Braddock is managing the Clark street amusement resort. Success to you both, gentlemen.

There are picture slides, colored ad slides, mica and other ink-writing slides, all for the benefit of the "busy theatre man" all over the country, but there is one slide just introduced in Chicago that seems to be the real thing. It is called the "Emulsion-Kote" slide, being coated on one side with an opaque substance through which whatever is desired can be written on the glass with a slate pencil and thrown on the curtain in as vivid a manner as the light can flash it. The finest lines are perfectly distinguishable, and the better houses here are adopting it. I am well acquainted with the young man who discovered it, and want to say that it will be fittingly heard from through the Moving Picture News shortly. Those interested can address, Emulsion-Kote Co., 368 East Fifty-fifth Place, Chicago, and, possibly, get a sample; but I do not know for sure. The young man has just started, but I am told by managers of the best houses on the South Side that it is a wonder and absolutely satisfactory. I hope, for the benefit of the moving picture industry as a whole, it will prove to be what is claimed for it by its present users.

The Log Cabin Theatre, at Whipple and Madison streets, does not seem to be much affected by the holidays, judging from the crowds I noticed going in and out of the neat playhouse last Wednesday evening. This is what can be fittingly called a real family theatre, as the manager informs me his audiences are mostly made up of the same faces every evening, which speaks well for his choosing of films.

Mr. David G. Fischer, for three years leading man with the American Film Manufacturing Company, and, by the way, a great friend of The Moving Picture News, has been secured and this week will be in the employ of the Selig Company, one of America's best film plants. I sincerely sympathize with the American company in their loss of this gifted young performer, whose most favorably familiar face will be sadly missed from their reels; yet, at the same time, I extend deeply profound mutual greetings of congratulations to both Mr. Fischer and the Selig Company. What makes this transfer of more than passing interest and importance to me is that it admonishes the theatre-going public that the "great and impassable" chasm said by some to exist between the licensed people and the independents is not so "impassable" as they would have us believe. And now, as a most pleasant palliative, both to its own company of performers and its large clientele among the show-going people, I respectfully suggest to the American Film Company that it step across the imaginary picket line of the license folks and annex a star to fill the space left by the absence of Mr. Fischer—and it must really be a star to come up to his standard. At any rate, here's hoping for good luck to all parties to the deal.

During a stroll along North avenue the other evening, for both acquaintance and information, I visited four theatres whose individual managers are not daunted at the seemingly slow holiday business. They are: The Krag Bros. Theatre, 3234 North avenue, of which Carl Krag is manager; Mr. S. Levine, owner and manager at 659; Clarence Lautenschlage, manager of both the houses at 3421 and 3433; and Rudolph Wenk, manager at 3515, all on North avenue. All of these gentlemen are more or less competitors, though good-naturedly so, and the result is, four of the very neatest and cleanly kept 5-cent theatres on the North Side.

There is trouble out at the Plaza Theatre, 308 West North avenue, and all the union employees are locked out, so I am informed by the business agent of the Stage Employees' Union. This is one of the Interstate houses, and the arrangements between the union and the management for some time have been very unsatisfactory, but it is hoped that things will be adjusted soon, and that all will be well with both sides. As I bade him adieu and started away, he called, "Don't forget to say for me that the Virginia Theatre, on Madison near Halsted, is scab from roof to sub-basement, and that if it should ever become known that a union stage hand were seated in the audience at that joint, the curtain would be rung down, the lights put out and rain checks be issued at the door—and that's no fairy dream, either." N.G. would sound better for this house than Virginia, under its present management

COLUMBUS, OHIO, December 30.—Some of the best appointed moving picture theatres in this broad land of ours can be found in Columbus, the capital city of the Buckeye State. There is the Columbia Theatre, for instance. The management permits no illustrated songs, but the patrons do not seem to mind this fact in the least. It would be advisable for all other theatres to follow the Columbia's good example unless the character of the illustrated song is uplifted.

William James is manager of the Broadway Theatre and uses kinemacolor service to excellent advantage. He uses vaudeville excepting Sunday nights, and we do not like the vaudeville feature and told him so. He laughed.

The Columbus Theatre was visited. Thompson Brothers are the managers. The Film Supply service is used and everyone is pleased, of course. Edison machines project the pictures in faultless style.

John W. Swain is manager of the Pastime Theatre on South High street. This is one of the prettiest appointed moving picture theatres in Columbus. Universal service is demanded. Two Powers Sixes are used for projecting the pictures and the operating here is in charge of two gentlemanly fellows who know their business in every sense of the word. The operators' booth is roomy and is built of solid concrete. Mrs. Eichner is in charge of the ladies' retiring rooms and every comfort is given the people. There is a careful eye to comfort and detail in the popular playhouse.

The moving picture theatres of Columbus are well patronized and all are conducted orderly, and only first-class service is shown. The Sunday evening audiences are composed of the best people in the city and they appreciate the excellent entertainments given them at small admission prices. The seats in the half-dozen theatres we selected at random for visits are roomy, and there is an atmosphere of refinement and ease plainly noticeable and evidently carefully fostered. There is an absence of garish lighting, and the theatres are all spic and span. The exhibitors in Columbus are all sympathizing with their brethren in Cleveland and, as elsewhere in Ohio, they hope that the Cleveland exhibitors will ultimately win out in their battle for fair play and justice.

The Columbus exhibitors' league gave a ball recently and the receipts therefrom were almost $1,000. A similar ball will be given next year. The affair was held in Memorial Hall, with an attendance of over 2,500, who came to give approval to the moving pictures and their exhibitors and to see the real actors outside the pictures.

Five actors formed the cynosure of all eyes at the ball. Where they stopped, a mob a dozen deep formed. There were Francis Bushman of the Essanay Company, former stock company actor at the Colonial; Arthur Johnson, Miss Lottie Briscoe and Miss Florence Hackett of the Lubin studio; George Perilot of the American Company.

During the evening pictures were shown in which each actor appeared. "Handsome Francis Bushman" was sought by all young girls and his pictures were applauded enthusiastically. Expressions of "Isn't she cute?" followed Miss Briscoe about the room. Her flashing black eyes and raven hair created many converts.

Mr. Perilot, of the American films, appeared much interested in all pictures shown. "I like to watch my own pictures," he said. "I find so much to criticise in them after they are finished and actually shown on the canvas. It seems often that I am another man watching my own pictures. There isn't the least bit of self-consciousness in watching them.

"Even with mistakes, a film is better than with breaks in the line of acting. A young actor is apt to forget and stop suddenly while he stares at the camera. I have known older actors who did the same thing."

To sum up, Columbus exhibitors dwell together in amity and with well-appointed pictures, and an appreciative public. All is happiness and prosperity. May it ever be so is the hope of the Moving Picture News representative.

* * * *

Some of the Columbus Exhibitors' League officials point with pride to the fact that moving pictures are to be used in all parts of the state to urge the necessity of Ohio making a good showing in the Panama Canal Exposition in San Francisco in 1915. The pictures show the Ohio gubernatorial party picking out the site for the Buckeye State Building and give an idea of the big exposition in the making. Then another question being earnestly discussed among the Columbus exhibitors is the proposed attempt of Mayor Baker, of Cleveland, to close the Forest City theatres on Sunday. "Mayor Baker cannot close motion picture shows on Sunday according to test decisions of Judge Phillips, of Dayton, and Judge White, of Kenton," said a Columbus leader. "The Cleveland exhibitors will take the matter through the courts and, if necessary, every league member in Ohio will aid in the fight," he said. Baker is waging war on "crime" pictures, and his Sunday closing threat is the latest move in the crusade.

Columbus exhibitors, like exhibitors in all other sections of the country, favor an immediate toning down of so-called "feature" films that seek to profit by things sensational. The Columbus leaders favor less "blood and thunder" and less gun play. The suggestive is also frowned upon. Greater accuracy and attention to details in some pictures are also favored. Those taking any of the more important services are free with criticisms. In "twenty years after" stories it was pointed out that often the very same scenes without a chair misplaced and the characters wearing the same garments are shown a discriminating public. Ungrammatical sub-titles are also cause for objection, and we were shown a film in which the hands of the clock pointed to the same hour although "five years have passed since Tom went to the war." Trifles, you may say? Yes, but attention to the little things make perfection of the whole and the great Middle West audiences are becoming more educated in their criticisms of carelessly prepared playlets. The feature film has come to stay and is assuming prime importance. Let the manufacturers be warned by sentiment west of New York City to make these plays, as well as the releases of usual length, clean and pleasant.

* * * *

John J. Lentz, of Columbus, may become Postmaster-General in President-elect Wilson's cabinet. The moving picture men of Ohio hope so, and a number of Columbus exhibitors are strong for Lentz's candidacy. Lentz has acted as a legal adviser to Columbus and Ohio moving picture exhibitors and his address at the Ohio League convention at Dayton, O., last spring remains a masterpiece in filmland argumentation. He is a big man intellectually and has been active in the work of insurance companies for the past few years.

Some of the Capital City exhibitors deplore the filming of the Jack Johnson wedding. Not that they are alone in their disapproval, but Columbus exhibitors are an intellectual and refined body of men, and they believe, with the Moving Picture News, that such stuff is a detriment to the uplift of the industry. Members of the executive board of the Columbus Federation of Women's Clubs held a session soon after the Johnson wedding film was placed on the market and were unanimous in their disapproval of a display in Columbus of motion pictures of Pugilist Johnson and Miss Cameron, and appointed Mrs. Lyman Arms, chairman of the civic committee, to go with her committee and enter a protest to Mayor Karb. The Mayor said he would forbid the pictures, and they have not been shown. These pictures would not have been displayed had such action never been taken, but Columbus picture men rightfully point out the fact that even the filming of such occurrences are an insult to exhibitors and their theatres.

They have a glee club at Ohio State University, Columbus, and a co-operative music and singing course in connection with the university is planned. Co-operation means actual work, argue the young lady members. But how? Ah, the picture shows, so excellently conducted and so popular in Columbus. Why should not singing at these good moving picture theatres constitute a co-operative university course in music? It should, have decided the young ladies interested, and a request to the managers of theatre for permission to sing may be formulated. Whether the request will be granted is another question. That such a request is being considered is convincing proof that no better or higher class moving picture theatres are conducted anywhere in this wide world, than in the capital city of the great state of Ohio.

KINEMACOLOR

The opening at the Carnegie Lyceum, New York, (what I predict will be an extended engagement of the hall) was unique in many ways. First, for the select audience which packed the Lyceum, and then for the wonderful pictures shown. The program called for "The Making of the Panama Canal." This was preceded by actual scenes from the Balkan War, taken under the direction of my old friend. Mr. Frederick Villiers, the world-renowned war correspondent, who obtained special permission of King Ferdinand of Bulgaria for the cinematographing of these pictures, depicting the actual scenes of the war, which must be seen to be believed, and which bring the actual representations right to our own doors in wonderful vividness. It certainly is a coup de main for Kinemacolor in the procuration of these photographs.

Following these scenes, the Panama Canal, in all its gigantic ramifications, was shown in such wonderful distinctness that the audience, as one man, was taken out of its seats with surprise and delight. The "Sunrise on the Atlantic," which opens the program, is a magnificent piece of photography. The bathing scenes at Cristobal, the Atlantic entrance to the Canal, the Scotch suction dredge, marine drills and French ladder dredges that work side by side in the Mindi Cut, showing it before and after being filled with water, and then the explosion of twelve tons of Trojan powder, shows the magnitude of the work. The dipper dredges of a hundred horsepower to excavate three tons of work at a time were splendid. The cement mixing and the grabs, grabbing hold of rock conveyed by cable right to the piles, and the great sand pile, completed section two of the seven series of films.

Series three showed the concrete mixing and the building of a 94-foot arch, which required 1,290 tons to build concluding with the Spanish and Barbadian laborers. Number four showed us a view into the lock chambers, giving us the construction of 600-ton gates, the heating and the placing of the rivets, and the way these rivets showed up in their color of red-hotness was fine, and the forges whereby they were heated, and the flames, seemed to take us right into the workshop. The opening of the first gate of the Canal concluded number four.

Number five gave us the deepest cut of the Canal, with a seven-ton steam shovel at work. The Pacific locks, the intake culverts and the intake gates, the making of a ten-ton-caisson and its setting, and the Mira Flores locks and the Pacific sea level. Number 6 was a wonder, showing the 400-ton Berm crane laying lock foundations, with drill boring for blasting. The blowing up of a hill at San Padlo was certainly an exhibit of making the dirt fly, and the exclamation of dismay in the audience made one think the debris was going to fall out of the picture among the audience. The seventh of the series exhibited hydraulic excavation, and the way the rock dissolved under the pressure of the water showed the power of hydraulic boring. The Government lottery, the famous flat arch, the Memorial Day scenes in the Canal Zone are such as will be remembered by everyone in the audience, finishing up with the "Sunset on the Pacific."

Congratulations of the highest order must be given to Kinemacolor for these wonderful scenes of the grandest and largest engineering feat of the century, and, as predictions are in order, I feel sure that the Lyceum will be crowded every night to see these wonderful scenes brought out by Kinemacolor.—A. SIEGMUND LUBIN, OF PHILADELPHIA, HAS BEEN VISITING BERLIN, PARIS AND LONDON

Siegmund Lubin, who has been visiting Berlin, proposes to Americanize the German capital in the system of promoting the moving picture art. The newspapers hailed him as the moving picture king and gave him every encouragement. Mr. Lubin says that they are far behind us in advertising and running the photoplay theatres. The public are not informed of what pictures are to be exhibited, and the continuous performances are not taken advantage of. Mr. Lubin is anxious to construct a plant in Berlin and offers to put $1,000,000 into the venture.

GAUMONT WEEKLY

The world-wide activities of the Gaumont Weekly forces are clearly indicated in its issue of January 1, No. 43. Subjects covered include the Philippine typhoon of recent date; a religious ceremony in Lima, Peru; a railroad journey through Cuba; the launching of a German vessel; a party of American tourists at the Pyramids in Egypt; and events in Californnia, Washington, Illinois and New York.

To gather material for this issue of the Gaumont Weekly ten camera operators were employed. The combined distance necessary to travel from New York City to the places filmed total 28,000 miles. The pictures of the Philippine typhoon were the only ones taken of that disaster.

The Weeklies produced by film manufacturers having international connections thus occasionally show their wider scope. The Gaumont Company has branch offices and camera operators in almost every large city in the world. Consequently producing a weekly as comprehensive as No. 43 is a simple matter. In a purely domestic economy it would involve expenditures so large that it would make its taking unprofitable.

THE SOLAX MENAGERIE USED IN THE PRODUCTION OF "BEASTS OF THE JUNGLE"

The Solax studio has been transformed into a veritable menagerie, with carnivorous animals the center of interest. A lion, tiger, elephant, monkey and parrot were used in the big state-rights special, "Beasts of the Jungle." As far as it is known, it is the first time since the beginning of the industry that as many different animals have been used in a single motion picture drama, and in which players appear on the stage with the wild animals. It is estimated that four weeks will be consumed in the preparation and taking of the pictures. A force of fifty men was added to the studio staff, besides a large number of extra members used in the cast. With the completion of the picture, all hands will be worn out, not so much by the natural fatigue that follows hard work, but by that constant gnawing anxiety that one of the wild animals would escape. If all the "props," scenery and other paraphernalia used were piled on trucks, it would take eight trucks to carry all.

Nero, the lion used in this production, is a big, majestic animal only two years in captivity. He is fine in appearance, but ugly in disposition. He is about seven feet long and four feet in height and weighs approximately 600 pounds. His four front teeth are each two and a half inches long, and his paws larger than a truck driver's hand. His claws have sharp points a half inch thick. His head looks like a cannon ball with whiskers around it. Nero has the record of having made a meal of four men, and has eaten a child for dessert. He has a roar that sounds like the rumbling of thunder. He is not very pleasant company in a parlor or at an afternoon tea.

Like some people, Princess, the magnificent Bengal tigress, has two sides to her character. At times, when she hears "the call of the wild.," she is as ferocious as her forebears in the jungles of Hindustan. At other times she can be petted like a family cat. Princess' spirit has been partially broken by the trainer's javelin. She has been in captivity for more than ten years. She is about eight feet long and three and a half feet high. She has a fine skin, and many a lady in the studio has cast covetous glances at it and seen pictures of Princess turned into a set of furs or stretched in front of the hearth. Miss Princess has a very graceful manner, and if she had ever been a member of a college athletic association, would have captured many medals for high jumping. Her long period in captivity has not interfered with her voracious appetite, and her table manners are not at all like those of a lady. Ten pounds of meat for Miss Princess is like a bonbon. Since her sojourn in the Solax studio she has made away with 200 pounds of meat, two cans of milk and seven inches of wood from the side of her cage.

Big, ponderous Jumbo and his young son, Trump, are elephants that, in the aggregate, weigh about a ton. Young and frail little Trump tips the scales at 700 pounds—the weak little thing! Jumbo is about as old as Methuselah and still carries seven or eight persons without losing his temper. He is as playful as a child, and shakes hands like a politician or a society matron, according to the way he sizes up his company. Jumbo, accompanied by his son, walked up the steps to the Solax studio as if he were about to pay a formal visit to his son's fiancee. Both father and son seem to delight in "showing off." They know they are regarded with admiration and respect, consequently they move about like peacocks—but not as gracefully.

Laura, the parrot, is a marvel. Laura is on familiar terms with everybody, and glibly repeats at appropriate occasions whatever she hears about the studio, including "tales out of school." A dangerous bird is Laura, more dangerous than Nero, her neighbor whose roar she delights in imitating. She has been taught to say "Hello, Solax," "Hurrah for Moving Pictures." Something Laura does enthusiastically is saying "Hurrah for the Magnet," and immediately after laugh in derision—as if it were the best joke on earth. She is a linguist and can say "Vilst tu ein Vienna snitzel and Pilsner haben?" and repeats "Oui, oui" with deliberation. At moments when serious work is on the program and during a lull preceding indecision or planning. Laura will butt in with, "Let me do it," or "Don't you think I know it?" Sometimes we almost believe Laura has intelligence, more intelligence, perhaps, than some players—not mentioning names.

Laura shares honors with her neighbor at the right. Mr. Dick is a personage, according to the Darwinian theory, and an animal, according to common sense. Dick, the monkey, is a diversion between rehearsals. A bribe of a lump of sugar will be sufficient to induce him to give a repertoire performance. Dick can hold up a mirror and imitate people combing their hair, shaving, or will powder his nose, and get the proper expression, too! Evidently Dick has inherited a mania for cleanliness. He deliberately and minutely inspects every inch of one's wearing apparel, and the smallest speck does not escape his vigilance. If one would let him, he would even perform the duties of a health officer and make an inspection of the sanitary condition of one's hair. Dick is not on a diet nor is he select in the choice of food. He puts in his mouth everything he finds and draws the line at nothing.

While these animals will do many entertaining stunts voluntarily, it is an entirely different matter when a particular stunt is ordered by the director, Edward Warren, who has staged pictures with almost every animal in creation—rats, dogs, cats not excluded. It is estimated that he will waste 7,000 feet of negative before he will get the desired results.

Little Vinnie Burns more than once showed her pluck in pictures. She is a little daredevil in her riding, and can do more stunts on a horse than some cowboys. In the "Beasts of the Jungle" she is the little daughter of the American engineer. She rides off on an elephant and loses her way. Eventually she finds herself in a trap alongside of a jungle tiger.

A little girl who has been brought up in a crowded New York, among two-legged animals is not accustomed to facing a ferocious tiger without experiencing some emotion. After her first scene with the tiger—a scene only two minutes, or a hundred feet, long—Vinnie felt as if she had gone through eternity. Every person in the studio who watched the scene was stirred by an emotion akin to that indescribable feeling experienced at the race track or at a bull fight. It was a wonderful sight. It was a sight genuinely thrilling. The uncertainty, the unusual situation of a young girl cuddling alongside of a tiger, as if that most ferocious and most deceitful beast was only a family pet.

There are other thrills, other sensations. Paul Bourgeois' spectacular fight with a lion in one of the scenes will undoubtedly be the talk of the country. During the fight every man and women in the studio was armed with a rifle or a revolver.

SIMPLEX IN THE NEW YORK SCHOOLS

The Board of Education, of New York City, has just placed an order with the Precision Machine Company for a Simplex projector for use in one of their school buildings.

EDNA PAYNE

Edna Payne is one of the leading ladies of the Lubin Stock Company, a talented little American. She has been a Moving Picture actress for the past two years, prior to which she affected Stock Company work. Being an excellent pantomimist the photo play work appeals to her, and she is likely to follow it for many years.

NEW FILM CONCERN

A corporation has recently been formed, called the Sun Film Corporation, for the making of feature, star and educational film productions.

Negotiations have been entered into with the International Film Trade Company for a complete factory, located on Berryman street, East New York. All actively interested in this concern are men of experience in the moving picture industry. The officers of the company are: Tobias A. Keppler, president; H. A. Spanuth, vicce-president; Sydney Ascher, secretary, and J. H Drehier, treasurer.

THE GREAT OCEAN DISASTER

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Great Northern Release)

OH, father, isn't he splendid?"

"Yes, he is very good indeed. What is his name?" Captain Wilson consulted his program.

"Why, you know who he is, father," answered his daughter. "He's Frank Harvey. He is very well known. This is his last appearance before sailing for America. I think he sails to-morrow."

The young entertainer was called back again and again, and it was only by the promise of another song later in the evening that the audience finally permitted him to leave the stage.

Mary sat with flushed cheeks and shining eyes. She watched the other numbers on the program almost as in a dream. She, too, was to sail for America the next day, and so her imagination began to run riot.

Mary's father was captain of the steamship Sverige. He had made many a trip and since the death of his wife a year before, Mary had traveled with him.

The girl had been always companionable with the young people on board, being as free and unconscious with the young men as with the the girls. But when she saw Frank Harvey something happened. It was nothing new in the history of the sex, but to Mary it was even undreamed of.

On the way back to their hotel she was so quiet that her father asked if she were ill. That night did not hold much sleep for her.

She was not melancholy, for she knew that she would at least have an opportunity of seeing Harvey on the stage in New York, and she felt sure she could find some way to meet him. But exactly what way she did not know. That, with the new emotion she was experiencing, was what drove away sleep.

Suddenly in her dressing the next morning, Mary stopped and stood still, her eyes wide and a thought which had just come to her: "Suppose he had taken passage on the Sverige?"

As quickly as she could she finished her toilet and went in search of her father.

"Come, father, let's go on board now. I am anxious to get settled."

"All right," said Captain Wilson, "we'll have some breakfast and away we'll go." He was delighted to think his daughter loved the ship that was second in his heart only to her.

When they reached the ship Mary went straight to her room. But as soon as she thought her father had gotten out of the way she went as straight to the purser's list of passengers who were to make that trip.

With fast-beating heart she ran her finger along the line of names. Before she could reach the bottom of the page she heard a step behind her. Thinking it might be the purser, and not wishing him to see her looking so eagerly over the list, she turned quickly. Behind her stood not only the purser but Frank Harvey.

For a moment they looked into each other's eyes.. Then Mary lowered hers and passed through the cabin to her room. But before she entered, she looked back and saw that the young man's interest was in her direction

"I must be introduced to him," whispered the girl to herself. "I simply must, and I must get father to do it if possible. I mustn't ask him to either, if I can help it."

When the ship was well under way and the majority of the passengers had gone to their rooms to arrange their belongings for the trip, Mary went on deck, where she found as she expected she would, Frank Harvey.

Mary was not a flirt and she was sweet and girlish and clean-minded, but that indefinable, subtle something which is hidden somewhere in every woman and comes to the surface on occasions—more or less rare according to the individual—came into play now.

You could not say that Mary looked at Harvey. He could not say so. Yet he was conscious of something that had passed from her to him. So, of course he looked at her, and having looked he looked and looked again.

Mary walked a short distance along the deck, where she stopped and leaned upon the rail. She turned her head toward Harvey and looked just past him. The young man did not look past her.

As though seeing in the distance something amusing, Mary smiled to herself with a faraway look in her eyes. Harvey began to move toward her. She did not move until he had almost reached her side. Then, as though she had been entirely alone, she turned and walked forward.

"What kind of a game is this?" said Harvey to himself. He knew the girl did not look like the ordinary flirt. In fact he could not say that she was flirting with him. But something interesting was surely going on and he determined to follow it out to the end.

Mary ascended to the upper deck. At the top of the stairs she looked back with that same tantalizing indefinite look.

Harvey had fully made up his mind to go on until he got a smack in the face or something equivalent to it. He climbed the stairs, too.

Mary wandered around the deck apparently without aim. On the bridge stood the captain. His back was toward them and Harvey was hoping he would not turn around or that Mary would not go in front of him.

The girl drew closer and closer to the bridge, from time to time looking behind her in a way that made Harvey more and more determined. He followed until she began to climb to the bridge. Then he stopped. He would wait, he thought, until she came down again.

He wandered around trying not to look toward the bridge.

"That young fellow looks lonesome," said the captain, noticing Harvey. "He's probably just left his sweetheart. By George!" he exclaimed, turning to Mary, "I do believe that's the fellow we saw last night at the Music Hall. What was his name?"

Mary was tactful enough to hesitate before answering.

"I think it was Harvey."

"That's right. I remember. Shall I speak to him?" asked the captain.

"It would be very nice, I'm sure, father. You always make people feel so at home." Mary could scarcely conceal her excitement, now that her plan had been almost carried out.

Captain Wilson leaned over the railing.

"Mr. Harvey?"

The young man looked up in surprise.

"You are Mr. Harvey, aren't you?"

"Yes."

"Won't you come up? There's lots of room."

"Why, yes, thank you, I'd be glad to," answered Harvey, not able to keep a note of wonderment out of his voice.

"I am Captain Wilson, Mr. Harvey, and this is my daughter Mary," explained the captain, when the young fellow had reached his side. "I hope you will have a pleasant trip. Please make yourself entirely at home, and call upon me if there is anything I can do for you."

"Thank you. You are very kind."

"Not at all," replied Captain Wilson. "My daughter and I were most pleasantly entertained by you last night and I should like to have the opportunity of paying our debts."

"Yes we did enjoy you so much last night," said Mary, and this time she looked straight into Harvey's eyes What she saw there must have contented her for as she went along the deck to her room she smiled to herself and hummed a tune Harvey had sung the night before.

Young Harvey was now completely at the beck and call of Mary He was her very shadow whenever he had the chance to be. Mary had certainly triumphed completely, for the poor fellow was hopelessly in love

Captain Wilson soon saw the situation and invited Harvey to sit at his table, so the young people were much thrown together.

The third night out was bright moonlight, but the air was rather sharp and had driven most of the passengers into the cabin. Mary alone stood upon the deck. She had wrapped herself up well and gone out into the moonlight to think over the events of the past three days. As she was leaning upon the railing watching the light upon the waves, she heard a step at her side.

"Do you mind if I come, too?" asked Harvey.

"No."

He leaned beside her and neither spoke for some minutes. Finally Harvey said very softly:

"It seems three years instead of three days that I have known you."

Silence.

"Does it to you?"

"Yes." (Very low.)

"Do you know there is something I want to know very much. Will you tell me if I ask it?"

"Ask it."

"Well, did you try to make me follow you the other day or not? I thought you did then, and yet I can't for the life of me think of anything you did. Tell me, did you?"

Mary turned her face toward Harvey with an expression on it that made the young man reach out his hand for her s, where it lay on the rail. But instantly the expression changed.

"Look!" cried the girl. "What is that?"

Harvey looked.

A small, but steady stream of smoke was pouring from somewhere in the lower part of the ship—some place where there should be no smoke.

"I must find father," Mary gasped, and ran along the deck, Harvey following.

Captain Wilson was on the lower deck with a few of his men.

"Father!" cried Mary.

Captain Wilson read the thought written upon his daughter's face.

"I will not deceive you my child; there is danger, but we may be able to overcome it. You can help me greatly if you have the courage—you and Harvey."

"Tell me what to do."

"Ask Harvey to entertain the passengers for a while—as long as he can, without letting them know that anything is wrong. They must not know if it can be avoided."

"I'll do my best, father," and Mary ran back along the deck to meet Harvey.

"You will do it, won't you?" she pleaded, when she had told him her father's plan.

"If you tell me to I'll do anything in the world."

Mary did not answer, but hastened on to the cabin, knowing that Harvey would follow.

The announcement was made and the entertainment began. Number after number was given until the audience wondered at the versatility of the performer.

As they clapped and laughed and talked with one another they little dreamed that the wireless operator was sending the "C. Q. D." as strongly as he could.

The sailors were fighting with all their strength, but the time was long and little had been done. Harvey had taxed his strength to the utmost and felt that he must retire for a moment before going on. As soon as he was hidden from the people by a curtain he fell in a faint to the floor.

The passengers, believing that the entertainment was over, arose and began to disperse. Mary heard them, and in her desperation, came before the curtain and told them please to wait a moment, that she had a surprise for them. She did not know what she would do, but she felt that she must, by any means, keep the people there.

Then, suddenly, with no warning, great clouds of smoke poured into the cabin. Panic followed. Screams rent the air, chairs were overturned and there was a mad rush for the doors.

On the deck the crowd was met by Captain Wilson. His face was blackened with smoke and his hair dishevelled, but his manner was firm and courageous.

"Try to be calm," he called to the people, "and all will be safe The lifeboats are ready and word has been received that the Adelaide is coming to us as fast as possible"

The majority of the people were calmed by the captain's reassurance, but some, crazed with fear, seized life preservers and leapt into the sea.

Harvey had not gained consciousness and Mary staid by his side, caring for him as best she could.

The boats were filled and launched upon the moonlit water. The rescue ship was sighted and a great shout greeted her. Captain Wilson put all of his men into boats before he would consent to go.

"Are all safe?" he cried.

"All," came the answer.

"Where is my daughter?" he called.

"She is ahead," some answered.

"Make fast a cable," he commanded, "so that the ship may be towed."

The captain's orders were followed, and when the Adelaide arrived the cable was made fast and the doomed ship towed at a safe distance.

When the Adelaide had started on her way again with her new passengers, Harvey came to himself.

"Come, we must go on deck quickly, father will be worrying about us," Mary told him.

They made their way to the deck, but found their passage cut off. They turned and retraced their steps, only to find themselves cut off on the other side also.

"Come, we must go below," Mary cried, seizing Harvey by the hand and hurrying forward. She took the only clear passage and they soon found themselves in the bow of the ship with the fire steadily creeping behind them.

Realizing at once what had happened, Mary turned to Harvey and said: "Father thought we were safe. I am afraid there is no hope now."

The dawn was just breaking over the water and Harvey strained his eyes toward the rescue ship.

"We must call as loud as we can," he said.

They both put forth all their strength, but heard no reply. They had no time to wait for the fire was close upon them.

"Look!" cried Harvey. "The cable! It is fast to the other ship. Can you—dare you do it?"

"We cannot do worse than stay here," said Mary, so quietly that Harvey felt a thrill of admiration for her.

"Come, then, there is no time to lose." He lifted her over the railing and steadied her until she had fast hold of the cable. Then he followed her.

Slowly they made their way forward, with little hope, yet clinging with that little to the life that had become very sweet to them.

Captain Wilson, standing on the deck of the Adelaide, strained sad eyes, in the early morning light, toward his burning ship. Suddenly he gave a cry and seized a glass from a seaman close by.

"Quick! lower a boat and row as you never rowed before," he commanded. "There are two persons clinging to the cable. They cannot hold out long."

The captain himself sprang into the boat.

Not until the two young people were lifted into the boat did he know who they were.

"My little girl, my little girl, thank God you are safe," he murmured again and again.

Mary kept her courage until they reached the deck of the Adelaide. Then, womanlike, when the need for strength had passed she gave up and sank to the floor. Harvey raised her in his arms and carried her to a chair.

"You are a great comfort," she whispered.

"Let me always comfort you, won't you, Mary?" he asked.

Mary nodded and hid her face against his arm.

"Tell me, dear," said Harvey, "did you make me follow you that first day?"

And in spite of the sorrowful sight of the burning vessel, Mary looked up with a subtle something in her eyes and smiled an indefinable smile.

HAROLD C. PIERSON, OF HOCHSTETTER UTILITY CO., SAND-BAGGED

We are glad to learn that Harold C. Pierson, of the Hochstetter Utility Company, is recovering from the severe beating which he received on Monday night, December 30th, at Forty-ninth street and Broadway. Mr. Pierson was also relieved of about $300 in cash.

AN EXHIBITOR'S CAMERA

When, in June, 1912, the editor of the American Journal of Photography requested me to write an article for the forthcoming Annual, I selected as my theme "Cinematography," and wrote an article which I would like every reader of The Moving Picture News to peruse. Every photographic supply house will supply a copy of the Annual, and I would like each of the 10,000 odd readers of the News to get a copy and put to good use the hints I give in that article. At the time I penned my remarks I was not aware that Mr. A. G. Whyte, of the Whyte-Whitman Company, New York, had been working to obtain such an outfit for some considerable time, and which materializes to-day and I illustrate in this article. The description of this outfit I can give by saying that it is a beautiful mahogany-finished box, containing mechanism of polished steel and brass; it is supplied with four film boxes fitted with hinged doors, of a capacity of 100 feet each. It is equipped with a Bausch & Lomb Zeiss Tessar lens, working at F 3/5, having a solid leather carrying case. The tripod with which it is equipped has a new panoramic device and is fitted with extension legs. It is also fitted with a tilting table, which will work either up or down, and the tripod is supplied with a strong fiber carrying case.

When I wrote my article I mentioned many methods of use, such as the photographing of towns for publicity purposes, and each exhibitor who possesses one of these cameras would be able to secure the local crowds before his own door, making weekly features of local interest, which could be well interspersed with the usual weekly releases. There have been so many "fly-by-night" companies and so-called advertising and publicity companies, whose only object is to get investors or clients to hand out a large sum of money, with the promise that their manufactories, etc., shall be exhibited all over the country—promises which, except in a few exceptional cases, have been observed in the breach rather than in the observance—and the publicity promised has never materialized, so that the money spent by advertising concerns has been lost, whereas, if an exhibitor in his own locality had had the opportunity to take these films himself, good would have accrued to him from the patrons of his house.

Among the industrial concerns who have paid to have pictures made we might mention the Canadian Railway, the United Shoe Machinery Company, the Buckeye Manufacturing Company, the Remington Typewriter Company, Shredded Wheat Biscuits, Bethlehem Steel Works, National Cash Register, Toasted Corn Flakes, Great Northern Railway Company, Studebaker Company, International Harvester Company and many others. Commercial travelers, with such an apparatus in their hands, would be able to show their own products easier than carrying around heavy, bulky packages, and many more uses, too numerous to mention in this connection, but which will lend themselves to the imagination of purchasers of such cameras. Towns and cities all over the country are using moving pictures for publicity purposes. Utica, Mount Vernon, Ithaca, Newark, Waterbury, New Brunswick, Des Moines and others have utilized the camera, and I think it is just as opportune for the local man, whether photographer or exhibitor, to look after this as a stranger. By so doing, there will be a more honest deal than is generally given in this class of work.

Cameras of this description will fill a long-felt want, and I understand from Mr. A. G. Whyte that this is the culmination of more than two years' work, during which time he was waiting to get the most perfect camera he could obtain. This necessitated many visits to England to see the camera in process of manufacture at Williamsons, Hove, near Brighton. Another point of value to prospective purchasers is made interesting by the statement that A. G. Whyte has made arrangements as agent for the raw stock, manufactured by the Goerz Photo Chemical Works. He states that everyone using this camera and film will receive a 50 per cent reduction off one regular charge for printing and development; that is, the Whyte-Whitman Company will develop the negative taken by each exhibitor at ½c per foot and print a positive print therefrom for another ½c a foot. The price of the unperforated Tenax film is 3½c per foot; the perforated is 3¾c per foot, and it is Mr. Whyte's aim to help each exhibitor who is unable to avail himself of this offer to erect a plant consisting of printing machine, with motor direct, four tanks for developing and ten racks to hold the film while drying, developing winding racks and darkroom rewinders; in fact, he offers a complete developing plant than can be erected in any room having a space of ten feet by twelve feet. He will also employ a technical expert to give advice free of charge. Further information can be obtained by addressing Mr. Whyte, whose advertisement will be found on another page.

UPPER ILLUSTRATION TILTING TABLE; LOWER, PANORAMIC ARRANGEMENT

A FEW WORDS ABOUT FILM MERITS

"Rival Canines" is a film which has a mission to perform in this world. Unlike a recently produced film from another well-known company which burlesqued one of the most important questions of the day, at a time most vital in its development, this film is a direct blow at the too numerous women who shower their affections on toy dogs.

* * * *

GAUMONT

"An Unwilling Resignation" is rather a condescension for Gaumont. It is perfectly harmless comedy of a farce nature but is not altogether worthy to be included in the Gaumont curriculum.

* * * *

AMERICAN

"The Blackened Hills" is a film which will stand muster in any theatre, church, or other institution. The line of distinction has been drawn between the good and the bad in this film that we have no hesitation in recommending it.

* * * *

PUNCH

"The Devil of a Time" is a harmless but of fun where an escaped lunatic runs away with the costume of a masquerader which is intended for a representation of the devil. It is really very funny and should excite much laughter.

* * * *

BIOGRAPH

"The God Within" is a film which from its merits is really deserving of special notice. So remarkable is this film in production that the more intelligent observer cannot but marvel at the mind which conceived such a masterly production of a hackneyed theme. All the Madonnas of the great painters rolled into one could not leave the tremendous impression that this picture left with its audience. It is wonderful. The most delicate touches of human life are portrayed in such a beautiful manner that even a child might look upon it with impunity.

"Two Boys," a comedy-drama from the Lubin Studio, is another picture which speaks of the artistic progress of the trade. This also is good for children to see, and has a remarkable thread of love and sympathy intermingled throughout.

* * * *

KALEM

"A Business Buccaneer," from Kalem, is one of the most thrilling of recent releases. This is a burglar story—a case of envy on the part of an artificial rubber manufacturer, excited by the return from the South of a young college graduate with a new formula for making rubber at a minimum cost. The dog in the story is utilized as a relief agent carrying a note from the imprisoned son and his sweetheart to the father, thereby saving the situation.

* * * *

"The Mayor's Crusade," a film treatise on the sweatshop system, is of more than ordinary merit. In fact, it should be seen by all as a lesson in such matters.

* * * *

A. R. Smallwood, former camera man for the New York Motion Picture Company, is now engaged on the Bison productions for the Universal Film Company.

* * * *

Ethel Grandin, the well-known and talented picture actress, will after January 1st become a member of the Universal Stock Company at Los Angeles.

EDISON

"A Clue to Her Parentage" one of the series of "What Happened to Mary," is very excellent indeed. Mary Fuller, Miriam Nesbitt, and Marc MacDermott making good in great shape.

MAJESTIC

"Love and the Telephone" can also be recommended to any style of audience, having all the pleasing qualities about it that serve to entertain the average audience, and with nothing really objectionable to even the most fastidious. There is plenty of comedy in it as well as drama, and it is thoroughly well played.

* * * *

SELIG

"Sammy Orpheus" is a most amusing comedy, which the Selig people call an animal comedy. The unsquelchable Sammy warbles forth the songs of his musical soul on a tin horn, however, instead of the lyre of Orpheus. This comedy is very well put on, the rhythm of Sammy's tunes is so contagious that everything and everybody with whom he comes in contact, even the old elephant, dances. White rats, tigers, leopards, etc., join in the fun.

* * * *

VITAGRAPH

"Who Stole Bunny's Umbrella?" is just what it might be expected to be with Bunny in it, only it is much funnier than some others in which he appears.

Bunny hangs the umbrella on the edge of the desk at the bank when he stops to make out a check. The umbrella drops to the floor unnoticed by Bunny, who coming back after finding himself on the street in the pouring rain, umbrellaless, forgets, in his excitement at not finding the missing article where he placed it, to look on the floor underneath the desk.

All kinds of comic episodes occur in the next few hours, during which Bunny parts with cash as well as dignity, including the paying of a reward for the wrong umbrella.

The story ends with Bunny being sued for $5,000 for false arrest.

ESSANAY

"The Sheriff's Luck" is a comedy-drama of excellent quality. The character of the Sheriff and also that of Widow Barrett is well portrayed. Scarcely a single touch could be added to the interpretation of the Sheriff given in this film to make it more realistic. This is really one of the most satisfying films that the writer has seen in some time.

* * * *

ECLAIR

"A Tammany Boarder," released January 2d, is an animal comedy in which a Royal Bengal tiger plays an important part. This film is really very interesting. The owner of the tiger is forced to leave his trunk behind at his boarding house when he himself is turned out for nonpayment of rent. The discovery of the tiger, and the following incidents create much fun.

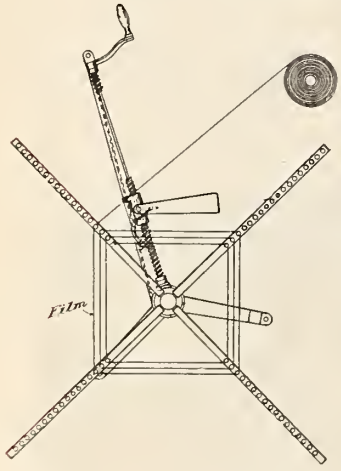
MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

Chairman Olfield, of the House Committee on Patents, is in favor of making the individual who first files an application for patent disclosing an invention the patentee thereof, thereby eliminating interference proceedings to determine priority of invention, reduction to practice, and the delay and expense involved. This is on the theory that the community at large is not really interested in the determining of who was the first inventor, but rather in the public disclosure of the invention, and that every incentive should be given to effect disclosure at the earliest possible date. It is true that under the present system a man who believes himself to be an originator of a basic invention may, after reduction to practice, keep it sub rosa for an indefinite time without material risk, but this course is frequently justifiable, for the reason that the state of the art in so far as the public is concerned is not "ripe" or sufficiently advanced to receive the innovation on a commercial basis; and many inventors are not as rich as Edison and other monopolistic adapters. Furthermore, such a change in the fundamental law would put an original but poor inventor at the mercy of any unscrupulous person who might obtain knowledge of the invention surreptitiously or otherwise, as inventions in the abstract are incorporeal and intangible, and a man who would not dare to steal an umbrella will unhesitatingly absorb and appropriate the gist of an invention and persuade himself that he conceived the idea eons ago. In other words, the proposed change would tend to legalize piracy, altogether too rampant even under present conditions, and hence we say change the practice but not the fundamental law.

Registration No. 895,542 is issued to Thomas A. Edison, Incorporated, of Orange N. J., for the word "HOME" as a trade-mark for motion picture exhibiting apparatus and motion picture films, used since January, 1912.



Patent No. 1,045 410, issued to Charles F. Jenkins, of Washington, D. C., relates to racks for holding long picture films during the operations to which they are subjected between the time of exposure and the time when they are ready for practical use. During such operations it is desirable to have the film in as compact and convenient form as possible without incurring danger of contact of its different parts with each other, and also important that manipulation of the apparatus with little or no light may be safe and certain.

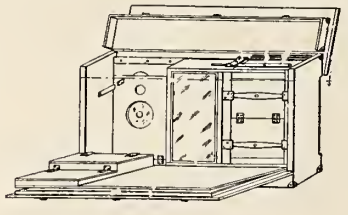
Hence the inventor provides a rotary film rack, which may be virtually increased in size while the film is being wound thereon and similarly decreased when the film is unwound, the film in winding forming a plane spiral the successive turns of which are at suitable distances apart. The rack involves a plane rotary member having radial sets of spaced fingers arranged to move successively into or out of position for holding separated the successive turns of a film wound upon the fingers and forming a plane spiral approximately parallel to the said member. For illustration said member is shown as a plane spider or star wheel, in the arms of which are headed fingers each sliding freely in its own vertical way in its arm, so that if the spider be rotated and the fingers, beginning with the innermost, be raised at the proper instant, film winding on them passes below the head of each and prevents it from descending when the finger-raising force ceases to act. In unwinding the film from the reel, the fingers fall in succession as the film passes from beneath the head of each. In this way, the effective diameter of the rack progressively varies during winding and unwinding. This construction forms one of many embodiments of the broader ideas involved in the invention.

Cataphonically speaking a lung-testing controversy is suggested by the case of "HOLLER versus CORNETT," 144 Ky. 420. Enough to make Rome howl.

Transmitting photographs over a telephone wire sounds easy, and it is so, provided you have the requisite means for sending and receiving. In fact it can be done without interfering with the regular use of a telephone line. Duplicate synchronously moving cylinders at either end of the line are all you need, provided you have the requisite accessories, all so simple, small and light of structure that M. Edouard Belin has devised a portable telephotographic apparatus—not exactly a vest pocket affair, but nevertheless adapted for convenient transportation.

Upon the transmitting cylinder a positive relief-process photograph is wrapped, the protuberances and depressions corresponding respectively with the whites, blacks and shades of the original negative. Microphonic contacts translate the variations in relief into electric currents of different intensities transmitted by the telephone wire to a receiver in which such variations are utilized to control and modify the intensity of light thrown upon a sensitized film on the other (synchronous) cylinders,—and there you have the whole secret of reproduction. But as intimated before there are accessories, the details of which have taken years of experimental investigation and labor to evolve. Query, are we on the dawn of a day when motion pictures of current events will be immediately transmitted and duplicated by marine cable from one side of an ocean to the other, saving days of time, in transportation? And may not the same result eventually be attained by "wireless?" Nothing impossible or improbable in either proposition. Thus the world contracts, and mundane education expands.

Nothing new under the Sun? Well, we guess Yes!! In Russia "it" is the "OFFICIAL CEMATOGRAPHER"; and a Muscovitic title means much, and then some.



Patent No. 1,046,367 to Haldor A. Anderson, of Ortley, South Dakota, assignor to Inga O. Anderson, of Bigstone City, South Dakota, is for certain Improvements in Photographic-Printing Apparatus capable of use for rapid printing on postcards or on regular photographic paper. The sensitive paper is adapted to be taken from a small print box and placed in a printing frame which is carried by a so-called carriage, to and from a position in which it is exposed to the light. Vignetters and light screens are adapted to be applied to the negative and exposed therewith, so as to give various photographic effects. A register or tally will indicate the number of movements of the carriage from its normal position into position to expose the negative and, hence, the number of prints taken may be easily and accurately counted. The accompanying perspective view represents the apparatus (which may be folded into the form of a portable grip or closed case) opened and in condition for operation. The nine claims cover the combination, with a case having a light passage, of a carriage provided with a printing frame and a colored glass plate, the said carriage mounted to move in said case, and to carry said printing frame and said colored glass plate alternately to and from said light passage, and various other parts and details in connection therewith.

Redford, the English censor of moto-picto-films apes under the authority of the ancient archaic and ultra-conservative London Council, which has power to cancel the licenses of electro-cinemato-theatres. Redford does not belie his cognatic appendix, becoming red-headed on the least provocation, and deeming it his prerogative to wade through filmy gore with or without pretext, his autocratic egotism rendering himself and his function obnoxious to all concerned. Is that worse than superfluous misrepresentation of ours, the New York Board of Aldermen, better qualified to control the censorship of films than the aforesaid mediæval London Council? The censorship amendment to the Folks ordinance ought to be eliminated. Our volunteer National Board of Censorship is doing excellent work, and can be trusted to do better as soon as the popular demand for higher class films increases. At present the National Board is handicapped by the "commercial" requirements of the trade. And then think of the possibilities of graft implied in said amendment,—for graft and politics seem inseparable in this land of freedom.

"A clock that stands still is right at least twice a day. A clock that runs but lamely may never tell the truth." (Maple Green Realty Co. v. Missouri Valley Trust Co., 237 Mo. 361.)

"Shall error in the round of time Still father Truth?"—(Tennyson.)

As a result of the care bestowed upon the subject by eminent specialists, the present Copyright Law of the United States seems to afford ample protection to owners of copyrighted motion picture films. Infringing films, like infringements of other copyrighted matter, may now be seized by a United States marshal and held pending a suit in restraint of infringement. Thus, recently the Nordisk Film Company, of Copenhagen, Denmark, effected the seizure of a film which had been surreptitiously brought into the United States against the provisions of our copyright law, and in violation of said company's rights. Without this provision for seizure pendente lite it would be practically impossible for copyright proprietors in the moving picture business to reach and control the numerous unscrupulous dealers who by various expedients obtain possession of unlawful copies of films, to the detriment of business of the lawful manufacturer. To put it mildly, these dealers lose sight of the distinction between the property right which they may acquire in a tangible celluloid film, and the property which the copyright owner has in the subject matter of the copyrighted film. Only the owner of a properly copyrighted subject has the right of film-duplication, and if others in devious ways possess themselves of a film showing such copyrighted subject matter and exhibit it, such conduct is not only inequitable but unlawful, the present copyright law affording a radical and immediate remedy for the abuse.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of the Moving Picture News.

POWER'S CAMERAGRAPH

Power's Cameragraph No. 6A has been installed at the Empire Theatre, Frederick, Maryland, by Arthur D. Gans, 104 North Gay street, Baltimore, Maryland.

SHARON, PA.—Plans are being prepared for a new moving picture theatre in Farrell. Mr. Harris, manager.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—The moving picture theatre at Seventh and Watkins streets was conveyed to Benj. Miller.

KLEINE'S RELEASES FOR THE WEEK ENDING JANUARY 11TH.

For the Tuesday release, "A Maid's Devotion" describes the unfailing attachment a young girl displays for her beloved mistress in a time of domestic difficulties. It is interesting to witness the clever way in which she follows every move of the suspicious husband who is making a strong effort to fasten the guilt upon his wife, as is also the final scenes in which she displays such humility and self-sacrifice when she calmly accepts all the blame upon herself to shield her mistress from disgrace. It is a story which is extremely well acted and which will go straight to the hearts of all; not one in the audience will fail to sympathize with the poor, innocent little maid.

"Kidnapping the Fiddler," the Eclipse for Wednesday, is certainly a "scream" and furnishes a truly feature comedy.

To complete the reel, "Along the Coast of Dalmatia" is a most fascinating travelogue, spreading before us the territory on the Adriatic Sea adjacent to where the Balkan war is being carried on with such great loss of life.

For the Saturday Cines, "The Woes of a Peacemaker" is also an excellent comedy attraction. It deals with the domestic difficulties of Albert and Louise, a pair of newlyweds, who are both of a high-spirited disposition and inclined to quarrel at the slightest pretext. To keep the peace, the wife's parents suggest that an uncle should pay them a visit. His alarm and utter consternation when the disturbances arise, are extremely amusing. But he proves to be very useful in the end, however, for he learns by a varied experience how to cope with this domestic strife and when finally a real serious difficulty arises, he proves the real hero of the hour.

NO TWO-REEL RELIANCE RELEASE ON JAN. 15th.

The next two-reel Reliance release will appear on January 22nd, when a pretentious production of "The Bells" will be released. On January 15th will be presented a special single reel subject with a double name, "The Wheel of Fate," or "Trapped by Science."

The Reliance will present Mr. E. P. Sullivan as "Mathias" in "The Bells" on January 22nd as a special two-reel feature. Mr. Sullivan is an actor of long experience and recognized ability, so "The Bells" will make an interesting picture for more reasons than one, especially as Mr. Sullivan has long been identified with Reliance films.

Mr. Sullivan starred in "The Bells" for three seasons in his own company.

The American Film Manufacturing Company ("Flying A") has purchased a quarter block of land at Mission and Chapela streets and immediately after the first of the year will start work on a glass and concrete studio to cost in the neighborhood of $50,000. There will be about a dozen buildings for the various departments.

GREAT NORTHERN

JAMES IS HUNGRY (Jan. 4).—James is a private soldier who falls into disgrace through a combination of hunger and appetite. The army rations are liberal enough, but they are not sufficient to appease the appetite of James. He has been appointed to duty at the home of Colonel Kraft, and loses no time in finding his way into the family kitchen. Here he plays havoc with a special luncheon which is being prepared for the Colonel, and to make matters worse, proceeds to make love to the buxom cook. He is interrupted by the arrival of the butcher, who has a soft spot in his heart for the young woman. He promptly throws James through a window and cuts off one of the tails of his military jacket in order to make his revenge complete. James runs a considerable distance, and, being again overtaken by hunger, pauses in front of a country home. Peering through the window he sees a table spread with good things and climbs in without an invitation. He is mistaken for a burglar while seated at the table partaking of the food prepared for supper, and escapes only after he has been shot at repeatedly by the angry householder. His hasty flight brings him to a steep hill and he loses his footing and rolls to the bottom. Here the Colonel and his guests are enjoying an outing and James promptly tumbles into the midst of the party gathered about the luncheon cloth. He begins to eat, but is placed under arrest and sentenced to pass his time at the barracks doing gymnastic physical culture exercises.

THE NEW BOOT CLEANER is another spirited comedy appearing on this reel. Fritz obtains a job as boot cleaner in a fashionable hotel, but through inexperience, he mixes the boots and shoes that he has collected during the night, and, when morning arrives, there are many complications on the upper floors. Guided by their own shoes, guests find themselves in the apartments and a riot is narrowly averted until the truth is learned. Fritz is found at work in the basement and only saves himself from physical violence by administering a dab of blacking on the face of each angry guest who appears at the small window. Finally be is surrounded and ejected from the hotel.

PUNCH

TOM, DICK AND HARRY (Jan. 23).—Mlle. De Loir, a pretty actress, has her jewels stolen out of her dressingroom in some unaccountable manner. She cannot be consoled until her maid suggests they send for Tom, Dick and Harry, three famous detectives who have never gone astray on any case.

The three arrive with numerous disguises and make-ups, and get to work at once digging out clues and asking questions. Little Tom finds the footprints of a rat in the talcum powder on the actress's dressing table. He needs no further clue. Aba! It was a rat. I will disguise myself as a cat and catch the thief! Donning the paraphernalia of a cat he watches at a hole in the floor until he sees the guilty rat going through. He follows it to its home and there, sure enough, are the missing jewels. Gathering them up he seeks his confreres and together they wait upon Mlle. De Loir and present her with her gems, restored through the sagacity and intelligence of these past masters of the detective's art—Tom, Dick and Harry.

MAJESTIC

THE LITTLE ENCHANTRESS (Jan. 5). Old Mr. Merton and his cross servant live together in a big mansion. Their chief annoyance is the children who play about the stoop and disturb them.

Little Dolly Deane, left alone by the death of her father, wanders out into the world and finds her way to Merton's home. When the servant attempts to put her off the stoop, she runs through the open door straight into Merton's arms. She says she is hungry, and out of pity they give her some dinner. But she shows no inclination to go and falls asleep on the couch.

The sight of the little sleeping child touches a tender chord somewhere in the crusty old bachelor's heart. He decides to slip out and buy her some toys. He meets his servant at the stoop and the two old men laugh at the joke on each other.

While they are gone the child wakes up and wanders downstairs. A burglar, entering the deserted house, meets the little one, who trusts him implicity, and never dreams of such a thing as being afraid of him. She calls to mind his own baby, long dead, and he sets about to amuse her, innocent of robbing the place.

When Merton returns he sees the burglar, and understands that he, too, has fallen under the baby's spell. He has a talk with him, and makes him promise to live a straight life. The man gives his word, and leaves the house without his tools.

The child, tired out after her day, falls asleep again and Merton and the servant creep in and draw the coverlet softly over her. She has won them both, and hereafter their home will be her home.

THE HUNDRED DOLLAR BILL (Jan. 7).—Luigi starts forth from his humble home to find work. He has a sick baby and there is no money in the house for food or medicine.

He helps a swell young fellow, who has been drinking too much, into a taxi and is rewarded with a bill. When Luigi looks at it he sees it is a hundred dollars. He runs after the taxi but cannot catch up with it. Deciding that he might as well use it, so long as he has it, he takes it to the grocery store. But the clerk is immediately suspicious and refuses to have anything to do with the hundred dollar bill. Luigi tries the baker, the butcher and finally the drug store. But no one will touch the money—they are all afraid of it.

Returning home in as bad a predicament as ever, he finds his baby worse and rushes out for the charity doctor, who after looking the child over, gives Luigi a prescription and tells him to have it filled at once. The drug clerk not only refuses to change the bill, but he calls a policeman and is about to have Luigi arrested when the young man who was drunk the day before, comes along and recognizes Luigi and the hundred dollar bill. He tells them the money is good and offers to change it. Luigi, with medicine and a basket of food, rushes home and shows his wife all the money he has left out of the hundred dollar bill.

PATHE FRERES

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 2 (Jan. 6).

LOVE UNCONQUERABLE (Jan. 7).—Max Linder is again to the fore as a lover who undertakes to convince papa that Max is the son-in-law he is going to have. Of course, the girl has decided that no one will do but Max, and with these two agreeable, there is nothing for father to do but comply, although he makes many brave and amusing attempts to avoid losing his daughter to the fickle Max.

PEGGY AND THE OLD SCOUT (Jan. 8).—Bill Gody, an express messenger, is entrusted with a bag of gold which he is to carry over the Broken Trail. He is mounted on his pet horse, Peggy, which he has taught to perform some clever tricks. The length of the journey necessitates a night's encampment. While he is sleeping, a band of Indians make him a prisoner. He refuses to tell where the gold is hidden and is tied to the stake, but Peggy with her teeth unties the knots that bind him to the tree. Gody is pursued by the red men, and while he is fighting them off, Peggy races back to town and summons some cowboys, who soon rout the Indians, thus allowing Peggy and the Old Scout to continue their journey.

THE HOLLOW TREE (Jan. 9).—The heir to a comfortable fortune is followed by a tramp and laid low with a blow from a hammer which the tramp had stolen from the blacksmith shop of Jeff Reed. The tramp buries the money near a hollow tree and then summons the police, who find the hammer and accordingly arrest the blacksmith. Reed's outraged family help him to escape from the cell, and he goes to the scene of the murder in search of some evidence that will clear his name. The tramp returns about this time and the blacksmith watches intently from the hollow tree in which he has concealed himself. When the tramp has dug the money from its hiding place and started away, Reed springs upon him, turns him over to the authorities and has little difficulty in proving his innocence and the guilt of the new prisoner.

RADIOGRAPHY IN PRACTICE (Jan. 10).—Something absolutely new! X-ray photographs are still one of the foremost wonders of science, but X-ray motion pictures are an innovation. In this film the action of the knee joint, the fingers, hand and wrist are seen, as well as views of various small animals under the penetrating rays, showing the workings of their interior organs.

On the same reel:

THE LIFE OF ANTS.—This industrious insect gives a lesson in thrift and systematic working which will be a revelation to a great many people, and an interesting and instructive film for everyone.

STARTING SOMETHING (Jan. 11).—Charlie Clarkson and his wife, Gwendoline, are very happy until his mother-in-law suggests to her daughter that she keep Charlie under control by means of mental suggestion. Gwendoline does. She tells Charlie that he has been poisoned by drinking just a little dark brown liquor from a punch bowl, and that in order to keep from dying he must keep moving. This tip alarms the servants, who immediately start and keep jumping until one by one they fall exhausted. Clarkson continues to impersonate a jumping-jack until Mrs. Clarkson breaks the spell, and he admits the joke is on him.

ESSANAY

THE "HEIRESS" (Jan. 7).—Jimmy, the impecunious, arrives at the club, where his fellow members are engaged in a game of cards. He helps himself to a cigarette, and borrows a five spot from one of the boys in the same breath. Baxter, a fellow club member, receives a message from the family doctor, stating that he had better return to his home immediately. Arriving at home he sends a message to the boys at the club telling them that the heiress has arrived, and that some of the nice marriageable fellows had better come up and meet her. Enthused with the spirit of being "near uncles," they buy everything from a rattle to a rocking horse, and with the cargo under their arms, swarm in upon the new father. In their excitement they leave the message on the table at the club. Jimmy picks it up and returning to his home dresses for the unusual occasion of meeting an "heiress." Out of funds, he returns to the club, where he makes a small touch. Returning to his home again, Jimmy takes all of his earthly belongings and proceeds to a pawnshop with them. He then calls at Baxter's home and, mistaking the maid for the heiress, invites her out to dine. With his roll of hard-earned money he buys the best of everything for her from soup to wine. Mason, one of the club members, sees Jimmy and the girl, and tells Baxter about it. They all go to the restaurant where Jimmy introduces the girl to his friends as his fiancee. Baxter invites them all to his home. The second maid brings in the baby, and the proud father introduces the baby to Jimmy as the heiress, and explains that the young lady Jimmy has been dining with is his maid. Realizing his terrible mistake, Jimmy dashes madly from the house, leaving behind a heart-broken imaginary heiress, and a hilarious congregation of club colleagues.

LUX

THE MATRIMONIAL FEVER (Jan. 10).—Mr. Templeton finds life quiet in his country residence, and despite the protests of his son's tutor he writes to his friend, Mrs. Roe, and invites her to visit him, and bring her nieces, who will be charming company for his son Harry.

In due course the good lady avails herself of this invitation, and she and two charming nieces are soon installed in Templeton's country home. Harry Templeton's tutor, a woman hater, decides to keep a watchful eye upon the feminine intruders, but despite his efforts Cupid manages to make his presence felt in the household in no light manner. His stinging darts go flying at random, and strike every heart with the exception of that of the tutor, whose lot it is, when after many amusing incidents the lovers have decided to take the step, to fetch the parson and witness a large number of marriages. Old Templeton, as well as his son Harry, are among the happy bridegrooms.

On the same reel:
DON'T TEASE THE DOGS.

VITAGRAPH

THE ADVENTURE OF THE AMBASSADOR'S DISAPPEARANCE (Jan. 10).—A gang of crooks are employed to get possession of valuable papers of international importance, held by the French Ambassador, Vicomte de Jarlais. They are also instructed to get the Ambassador out of the way and make it appear that he has committed suicide. His mysterious disappearance arouses the United States Secret Service officers, but they are unable to solve it. They find his hat and coat on the edge of a pier and they come to the conclusion it is a case of suicide.

Lambert Chase, the detective, is consulted and, after going over the ground, decides to put in practice a plan which he has figured out from his careful deductions. He gets on the trail of the crooks and decides that they are holding the man prisoner. He sends them a message that there is a case of merchandise awaiting them at one of the piers. They send a truck to the pier and bring it to their beadquarters. After receiving it they lock the door and proceed to open the box. At this point Lambert Chase springs from the box, armed with two revolvers, with which he holds them at bay, while he blows a whistle for the police, who are waiting outside the building.

The gang attacked the detective and severely beat him, but before they have done their worst the police break into the room and soon have them under control. Entering an adjoining room, they find the Ambassador, a prisoner, and release him. Lambert Chase is taken to the hospital, where be receives daily visits from the Ambassador, who gratefully compliments and thanks the detective for his valuable services to him and his Government.

LUBIN

THE VILLAGE BLACKSMITH (Jan. 7).—The story opens showing Dexter Pratt, the village blacksmith, in his early life, surrounded by his wife and children, Annie, Tom and Dick. Herbert, the Judge's son, is a playmate; be is a thieving, fighting, cowardly boy. Ten years elapse and the mother is dead. Annie is a sensitive, yielding, loving girl, and unfortunately she falls in love with the Judge's son, who simply plots her seduction. Tom Pratt is suspicious and watches. Herbert, influencing the girl, plans an elopement. He takes his horse to the blacksmith's shop to be shod, and then steals off with Annie to have a fake marriage ceremony performed by a college friend, who will pose as a clergyman. Tom discovered the plot and rushes to the father, urging him to interfere. The blacksmith drives a long nail in the horse's hoof he is shoeing. Tom then hurries to the scene of the mock marriage. He arrives too late and finds only the counterfeit parson. The Judge's son gets his horse, and, mounting the girl behind him, starts to elope. Tom and his father pursue the runaways and, the horse going lame, they are easily captured. The truth is exposed to the poor deluded girl and the young reprobate driven away. The blacksmith and his daughter take sanctuary in the church and the vision of the dead mother smiles down through the stained-glass window.

AMERICAN

ANOTHER MAN'S WIFE (Jan. 6)—Orrin Austin and his wife were visiting at the Hope Country Club. Austin merely left his pretty wife sitting alone; he made no effort to introduce her and showed his neglect plainly to the guests about the club grounds.

Austin, on the links, tiring of the game, met Jennie Wilton, a widow. They strolled throughout the grounds together, and the wife of Austin grieved in her heart at the sight. Her motber, proud of the splendid match her ingenuity has made, watched proceedings carefully, taking her wine on the great balcony and ever keeping an eye out for trouble.

It came when Jack Stanton, bachelor, made a spectacular drive. The ball rolled three hundred yards away and stopped at the feet of the lonesome wife. Acquaintance ripened into friendship in an hour. Returning, after a stroll with the Wilton woman, Austin saw his wife talking with Stanton. Instantly there was a clash. Austin turned upon his wife and the dislike of years focused in a bitter speech.

He went away after that with the Wilton girl and his lonesome wife, sitting alone, watched through a glass while Austin kissed her in a boat gliding through the trees toward the open lake.

A few minutes later Austin made up his mind. Pulling in toward shore, he wrote a note and sent a boy to deliver it to his wife. Stanton seeing it all, took the note from the servant and himself carried it to the mother of Mrs. Austin. She read it, smiled, gazed out to sea and turned happily toward Jack Stanton.

THE TRAIL OF CARDS (Jan. 9).—Don Pedro, a wealthy Mexican, and Bob Renick, ranch foreman, both loved Bess and both sought her hand. Her heart she gave to Bob, and when Don Pedro poured his passionate Spanish love into her ear, she sadly smiled and shook her head.

Don Pedro taught her to tell fortunes by cards and Bess often sat alone in the hammock, idly swinging and finding much amusement in the trick.

Don Pedro, alone in his gardens, brooded. He determined to kidnap her and took two Mexicans with him to her home. He found her in the hammock, threw a rope around it, quickly swung the hammock between the saddles of his peons and they galloped off. Swinging cradle-like between the horsemen, Bess bethought herself of her cards, and dropped them one by one, through the hammock.

Later her absence was discovered and frantic Bob, with a posse, took up the pursuit. He found the cards scattered along the way and followed the trail to the mountains. There a battle royal occurred and the Don, defeated by the very cards whose use he had taught pretty Bess, retired into the hills to spend the remainder of his worthless life.

GAUMONT

TO HELL AND BACK (Jan. 9).—Artie Artichoke realizes that in the midst of life we are in debt. In the cafe, although he would simply love to pay for his canary-eyebrow salad, he finds that he is broke, almost fractured. The proprietor has a few kind words to say, and Artie is in a fair way to spend the rest of his days in jail. Just then who should pop along but Little Red Riding Hood Mephistopheles, a devil of a fellow, and he sees an opportunity to add to his collection of humans, boiled, fried and fricasseed. He makes a perfectly good bargain with Artie, who writes a contract as follows: "Received from A. Lucifer Match, $20.00, rent of my soul for one hour. I herewith guarantee said soul to be in perfectly good working order, of fast color, and guaranteed not to shrink." Mephisto, old Top, escorts Artie to a helluva place and Artie has a helluva time. The devils there are devilish acrobatic and they put Artie through a thirty-third degree hazing, a corollary of what happens to verdant freshmen at West Point. Artie admits that they are merry cut-ups and says that if they are doing the tricks for his pleasure they can take a day off and change their act. After having been mauled until his patience is sadly frayed, the hour is up and Artie is wafted back to the cafe. It was all a Welsh rarebit dream.

GEORGE KLEINE—CINES

A MAID'S DEVOTION (Jan. 7).—Elvira is devoted to her mistress, Mrs. Dale, and is heartbroken when she sees her idol in tears, following her husband's severe reprimand for paying too much attention to a young artist.

Later, when Mrs. Dale has retired for the night, Elvira secretly watches the husband search the room and discover a letter from the artist, requesting an interview for the following afternoon. She then informs her mistress, who is thus enabled to write a note of refusal which is purposely permitted to get into Mr. Dale's possession.

This note entirely restores Mr. Dale's confidence in his wife, but he spends his fury upon poor innocent Elvira, who cannot explain, for that would incriminate her mistress. So after bidding the latter a tender farewell, the girl leaves in disgrace, but with a secret reward of money and eternal gratitude from the woman whose happiness she so loyally guarded.

GEORGE KLEINE — URBAN-ECLIPSE

KIDNAPPING THE FIDDLER (Jan. 8).—Billy, a fiddler, has a lucky chance. The famous violinist, Lukekik, being unable to attend a concert at the home of Madame Stafford, that lady gives instructions to her head butler to find a substitute artist at any cost. Billy is chosen, and his success is instantaneous. The guests are held spellbound by his music and a Baroness present is so enraptured with Billy that she has him kidnapped and taken to her home.

Now, Billy has a wife and ten children. When the good woman is informed of her husband's whereabouts she assembles her tribe and with a thick stick in hand goes to the palatial residence in search of him. Forcing her way in, she seizes Billy by the collar and angrily belabors him over the head with her stick. He finally breaks from her grasp, however and runs home, followed by his family in picturesque array.

ALONG THE COAST OF DALMATIA (Austria).—A most fascinating subject spreading before us the territory on the Adriatic Sea, adjacent to where the Balkan war is being carried on with such great loss of life.

THANHOUSER

THE BOOMERANG (Jan. 7).—A dying man confided his little daughter and his fortune to his only relative, a brother. The brother lived in good style, but no one knew that because of wreckless speculations he was skating on the edge of financial ruin. He accepted the trust imposed upon him, and really meant to keep it, but a time came when he needed securities to bolster up a stock deal. Quieting his conscience by swearing he would make it good some day, he used the gilt-edged stocks and bonds of his ward, replacing them with wildcat securities of his own.

The years passed on and the girl grew up in the belief that she was penniless and owed everything to the generosity of her uncle. He grew prematurely old and suffered from remorse. Finally, when as he believed the dead appeared and reproached him, he wrote out a full confession, and started to go upstairs, meaning to hand it to the girl, for he did not dare to confess face to face. He was very weak and staggered against the piano in the drawing-room as he made his way painfully toward the door. The confession fell into the piano as the writer toppled over to the floor dead.

The widow grudgingly gave a home to her niece, but made her life miserable. One day while the woman was in the drawing-room admiring a new piece of jewelry, she was summoned to the telephone in the library. She dropped the jewel on the table, and when she returned her niece was there, and the jewel had disappeared. No one but the niece had been in the room, consequently, the woman argued, she was the thief, and the gem was on her person or concealed in the apartment. Caring nothing for the disgrace she was to bring upon her own kinswoman, the widow summoned the police and the place was carefully searched. They did not find the jewel, but the confession of her husband's misdeed came to light, and the drudge received the fortune that was rightfully hers.

No human being stole the jewel. That was developed later. And the widow's friends wonder to this day why she has such a hatred of hand organs.

THE EVIDENCE OF THE FILM (Jan. 10).—A girl who worked in the joining room of a motion picture factory has a little brother, of whom she is very fond. He visited the plant one day and saw from "the inside" how pictures were made.

The youngster was a messenger boy, and later was summoned to the office of a broker and given a package which he was to deliver to a rich woman uptown. The woman received the package herself, opened it in his presence, but found only bits of a blank paper, instead of the bonds she had expected. At first she suspected the broker, but he clearly proved that, in the presence of two witnesses, he had placed the bonds in an envelope and carefully sealed them up. The messenger boy protested his innocence, but the woman and the broker both insisted that he be prosecuted, and the weeping child was locked in a cell. His sister pleaded with his accusers, but in vain, and for several days the case against the boy was dark.

One morning while joining film, the girl happened to glance with extra care at one scene. She thought she recognized her brother, and close examination under a microscope proved to her she was correct. With a cry of joy she rushed to the police station and told the officers in charge she had new and important evidence. Two detectives accompanied her back to the plant and saw a scene of a play thrown upon the screen. It repealed the messenger boy, a package in his hand, coming around the corner, whistling merrily. A man close behind him ran into and upset the child, deftly substituted a package he held for the one the boy dropped, and then walked down the street so rapidly that he did not notice the camera.

"Do you know that man?" screamed the girl. "He's the broker who had my brother sent to prison."

The broker was arrested, and when the evidence of the film was displayed to him he broke down and confessed. He had hoped by throwing the blame upon the boy to cop the bonds for himself. A long term in prison was his punishment, while the plucky girl was warmly complimented for the shrewd way in which she cleared her little brother.

KINEMACOLOR

AN AWKWARD MIX-UP (2 reels).—By Francis Seymore.—This novel play is made possible only by the power of Kinemacolor to reproduce natural colors.

The Hammonds get a letter from their son that his wife will arrive on the 11:10 train, "Meet her, the blonde lady in a red coat."

Mrs. Mason gets a telegram from an employment agency to meet their new cook at the 1:10 train, a blonde lady in a red coat."

Now the mixup begins, and the fun follows fast and furious. The cook goes to Hammonds' and is treated as the son's wife; the wife is sent into Mason's kitchen. Complication follows complication until the climax is reached when the son returns and wants his wife. He rushes upstairs only to find the cook—she, as horrified as Walter, rushes downstairs. In the meantime matters have been cleared at the Mason's, and they rush the wife over to the Hammonds. Explanations follow fast, and all the complications are straightened out.

There is not one idle scene in the film, and the adventures of the cook in the parlor at Hammond's, and the bride in the kitchen at Mason's rush to a natural ending, when the happy bride is in the arms of her husband, and the poor bewildered cook is allowed to go to the kitchen.

EDISON

AN UNSULLIED SHIELD, by Charles J. Brabin (Jan. 7)—His Grace, the Duke of Rutland, is dying and his family, consisting of his wife and his only son, are at his bedside. He admonishes his son to live up to the best traditions of his ancestors, and the boy swears to be a worthy son of a worthy sire and takes his mother in his arms, indicating that he will be henceforth her refuge, whereupon the old duke passes away, happily contented.

We later see the Duke in a Monte Carlo Casino. He loses to such an extent that he is wiped out and can only continue playing on I. O. U.'s. Upon returning to London he borrows money from a notorious money lender whom he promises to pay back in thirty days. He forgets about the obligation, but a month later he is forcibly reminded of it by the money lender, who threatens to expose him. He promises to settle the following day.

Afraid of exposure he forges his mother's name to a check. Later sitting in front of several great paintings of his ancestors, conspicuous among which is a shield, he falls asleep and in his dream he recklessly crashes a glass of liquor against the escutcheon.

One by one we see the gentlemen of the pictures leave their frames, advance toward the sleeping Duke, and in an intensely dramatic scene, each describes how he fought for the name which he bears.

The Duke is still asleep and slowly along the gallery is seen to approach his mother. She moves to his side and tenderly awakes him. He starts suddenly, looks around the room, sees the paintings, the shield, his mother, and is utterly bewildered. Suddenly he recoils and quickly crossing to the wall, takes the shield down and closely examines it. He finds it unsullied. Reverently raising it to his lips he kisses it. He looks toward his mother, and taking the check book from his pocket shows her the forged name. She is greatly affected, but coming to a decision destroys the check. He falls on his knees in deep contrition, but she gently raises him up, and, going to the table signs a blank check and presents it to him. After reading it he turns to the paintings of his ancestors and indicates that he will be true to the trust and leave no blot upon his escutecheon.

RELIANCE

A JOLLY GOOD FELLOW (Jan. 4).—Jack and his twin sister, Jacqueline, are good pals and the girl is as able a sportsman as her brother. He comes home to spend the holidays and the girl is overjoyed. They plan a hunting expedition. But an invitation arrives from Jim Clark inviting Jack to a house party, and to Jacqueline's dismay, he decides to go. At the last moment a wire from his father calls him to town. Jacqueline left alone, gets an idea. She will impersonate a friend of Jack's and attend the party. She wires ahead informing them that Will Graham, a jolly good fellow, is on his way to join the party. She signs the telegram "Jack."

She borrows Jack's things and sets off. She takes a room at the hotel and later goes down to the party, where the supposed "boy" is received cordially. Lois, to whom Jack is devoted, is a trifle disappointed, but finds the stranger good company. Will Graham proves a master hand at tennis and a capital shot. He puts all the other gentlemen of the party to shame.

In the meantime Jack and his father arrive home. Jack misses his clothes and realizes what Jacqueline must have done. He tells his father and they start in haste after her.

They arrive at the hotel and find her name on the register. Shown to her room they find young Jim Clark holding a boy's wig in his hand. The door to the other room is locked, Jacqueline evidently inside.

The case is explained to Jim, who is relieved at the explanation. Jacqueline is brought out, and after many invitations from Jim, consents to remain at the party with her father and brother.

And the Jolly Good Fellow and Jim soon become as inseparable as Jack and Lois already are.

THE GIRL AND THE INVENTOR (Jan. 8).—Young Tom Lawson in his little hall room perfects his invention to reduce the great cost of electricity. He goes to the millionaire head of a big concern—but this man has no faith in the invention and Tom is turned away. But the head of the factory hears Tom's explanation and realizes at once the worth of the invention. As Tom leaves the house the millionaire's daughter Alice expresses her belief in him and offers him money on his invention. This he refuses. Later, Tom is put out of his room by an irate landlady, which also appropriates all his belongings, including the invention. The manager calls to see him, and hearing that he has been put out he rents his room and finds the patent, which he steals, and places before a rival concern. Tom gets a job in the modelling room of this company and, to his intense surprise, sees his invention and also the manager. Realizing the truth he rushes to the millionaire and explains. Alice takes him in her car and they go to his boarding house, where they find the invention gone. Tom is in despair until he remembers some blue prints thrown carelessly on a shelf. With these secured, he feels safe. They go back to the factory and Tom accuses the manager who, of course, denies his guilt, claiming the invention as his own. Tom smashes it and then defies him to produce another. Of course he is helpless and then Tom produces his blue prints. The rival concerns see the value of the invention and get together to produce it. And Tom turns to the girl who had helped him all through, and as he bends over her hand, the old father sees the hint of a possible romance.

GAUMONT

A SNAKE IN HIS BOSOM (Jan. 7).—Colonel Melville, a French army officer, while horseback riding, flirts with a young widow and with audacity worthy of a better cause, he introduces her to his wife and daughter, with whom she becomes intimate.

At the widow's home, one evening, Colonel Melville, seeing a man's photograph, asks who the man is. She replies that it is her cousin. The liason between the Colonel and the widow develops beyond the platonic stage and one evening in the Colonel's home, in the momentary absence of his wife, he kisses her. His daughter sees the act of infidelity. Realizing the widow's power over her father, which threatens rupture of their home, she knows not how to recall her father to his sense of duty.

An article in a newspaper, which, by chance she reads, is an unexpected aid. The article tells of one Frederick Sturbar, long suspected of being the head of a corps of spies acting for a nation hostile to France, who disappeared as he was about to be arrested. His subordinates, the article continued, many of whom are women, are being sought by the police. Over this article was a duplicate of the picture of the man she had seen on the mantelpiece of the woman new seducing her father. She then realizes that the widow's interest in her father is of greater significance than that of things personal—that she is using the Colonel as a catspaw to learn secrets of French fortifications known to the Colonel in his official capacity.

Colonel Melville is horrified to reflect how he has been duped. His anger is partly that of the enraged vanity of the middle-aged man who finds that he has been the tool of a woman. He goes to this Delilah who had almost shorn of his locks, metaphorically speaking, and who had almost caused him to become a traitor to his country as well as to his family. The widow is not glad to see him. She is seated at a desk writing a letter, which letter she attempts to hide. He suspects that it concerns him and information she might have wormed out of him. A fight ensues in which she desperately tries to prevent him from getting the incriminating letter. Part of the letter read: "I am sending you the plan of Fort A. E. Its importance will be obvious to you. As to the required estimate, I will get it later. I am received at Colonel Melville's home and if . . . ." The Colonel realizes how far he has been drawn into the spider's web. He determines to retrieve his honor at all costs. "We are ten miles from the frontier. In an hour's time you will leave the country once and for all. If not—I will not shrink from any scandal!" exclaims the Colonel. He instructs an orderly to escort her to the frontier, and that if she attempts to escape—shoot her.

The Colonel, spirit-broken and thoroughly penitent, returns home, where condonation awaits him.

THE DETECTIVE'S SANTA CLAUS (Jan. 14).—Little Clara Barton is the leading lady in this picture and once more shows her ability as an actress, though, at the same time, she is crowded for honors by the other children in the play.

Detective Steele is considered a most conscientious and efficient worker on the police force. He is the father of quite a family, and as the Christmas holiday approaches finds himself rather hard pressed financially.

He tells his children how Santa Claus comes down the chimney on Christmas eve and fills the stockings of all well-behaved little boys and girls with toys and candies and goodies of all kinds. The tale has made a deep impression on the minds of the children. After hanging up their stockings on that most wonderful of all nights, they hit on a plan of trapping Santa Claus, and from the attic they drag forth an old bear trap which they set and put up in the fireplace.

It so happens that on this very night Detective Steele, with two other officers, is in pursuit of a well-known criminal for whose capture a reward of one thousand dollars has been offered. The hunted man eludes them in a chase over the roofs of the houses near the detective's own home. Believing they have lost him, Mr. Steele runs in to his home for a moment to see his family, and is very much startled by a most unusual commotion in the parlor. He rushes in and discovers that the criminal he had been after had been caught in the bear trap the youngsters had set for Santa.

The detective, of course, procures the reward, and the children have the best Christmas ever.

"NOBODY'S" LOVE STORY (Jan. 16).—He had done no wrong, still he was condemned to bear that name, "Nobody." He had never played a crooked game, still he was cruelly branded with that horrible tattoo, and on his clean hand appeared, in blue and red ink, the Queen of Spades, so that no man would ever play a game with him.

In our civilized country a man is punished by being imprisoned and when his time is served he is restored to liberty, but "Nobody" was forever and ever condemned to carry the mark of a rogue; on his hand was forever the sign of a card cheat. But "Nobody" was innocent—he had never played a crooked game nor taken a penny that did not belong to him—it was all done for the honor of a woman that he in silence adored—and so "Nobody" drifted away from the country.

Before long, however, the fever of the green cloth lured him once more to the gaming tables, but the cursed "queen" on his hand soon broke up the game.

The one for whom "Nobody" was cursed with the stigma on his distorted hand, was long since dead. "Nobody," believing that the dead would cleanse his hand, wends his way to the grave—he rubs his hand with the cold soil until exhausted he falls asleep; but wrapped in a mantle of snow he sinks into a far more beautiful sleep.

The little coquette, now awakened, sees that "Nobody's" hand was clean. The frost had bitten his fingers and chilled his heart—but the dead had cleansed his hand—"Nobody" played no more.

FUNNICUS MARRIES A HUNCHBACK (Jan. 19).—The heirs of the late Thomas Leroy are all assembled in the office of the attorney to listen to the reading of his will. Among Engraving on gold, decorating of pottery, what is he going to do now to make us laugh again?

The will is opened and the attorney reads: "I bequeath my entire fortune to my friend Funnicus, but on the condition that he marries his cousin, Marie Doron."

Consternation reigns and the disappointment is keen, for the other heirs are little pleased at thus being left out in the cold.

The thought of marrying his cousin is most distasteful to Funnicus, for poor Marie is afflicted with a hump on her back. However, no wife means no money, and Funnicus finally resolves that it is worth while making the sacrifice.

When the marriage is over, he cannot but help saying over and over again to his wife: "Ah! If only you did not have that hump!"

Finally, he decides he will try all means of ridding the girl of her obnoxious hump, and his attempts form a series of escapades that are screamingly funny. But we leave this to the imagination of the reader and advise—see the film! It is a barrel of fun!

On the same reel:

LIFE IN INDIA.—Contrary to the general opinion, this travel film shows the natives of India to be an industrious people rather than the shiftless creatures so many are prone to think them.

Among the small trades or vocations which the natives are engaged in daily, the following are shown:

Engraving on gold, decorating of potery, all kinds of tiling, ropemaking, and we learn also that their women are employed in masonry building, as street porters, as well as in the feminine occupations of linen-washing, hairdressing and fortune-telling.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

This being the first chat of the New Year, the writer wishes to give an account to all moving picture operators, whether they belong to Local No. 1 or not, what occurred and what was accomplished during the year of 1912. This issue will contain Part I, and if the readers of the chat will follow it up each week, reading every weekly issue, they will have something to go by when occasions arise for argument. It is impossible to print all in one issue, as it would require more space than one can imagine, therefore it will be published in parts. Now let us go back to the days of the old Auxiliary, or picture machine branch of Local No. 35. Was there equality? No; there was dissatisfaction, and something had to be done. "Who did it?" That is a question to be answered, and the writer will answer, Local No. 35 did it; but when one asks, "What have they done?" you can answer, they tried to heal a wound (dissatisfaction) by using pepper and salt for a salve. And "What was the consequence?" The wound become inflamed, and other steps were taken to get rid of the inflammation. Before going further, this affair of the old Auxiliary and No. 35 brings to my memory the Bible story I learned many years ago, that is the story of "Cain and Abel." Cain (Local No. 35) was very wicked and selfish and above all, very jealous of brother Abel (ex-Aux.), so that one day Cain (Local 35) decided to do away with Abel (ex-Aux.), and when this was done, a voice asked Cain (Local 35) what he had done, and where is Abel (ex-Aux.) The answer was "Am I my brother's keeper?" He knew he had done wrong, and feared. That was the reason he gave this answer, or asked this question when called upon to tell where his brother was. Strange enough, these words are uttered by the Spotlight Union No. 35 when they are asked a question by operators; yes, branch members who wish to know what became of all the ex-Auxiliary men or where are all the old operators, and what organization do they belong to? Their answer is at all times, "Am I my brother's keeper?" They fear to tell the truth, and certainly they have been marked as Cain, when the members of the Spotlight Union No. 35, or their so-called branch, come in contact with any one in the theatrical industry. That mark is visible. Surely they (Local No. 35) know what became of the old operators and what organization they belong to, but they know they have done wrong and that is the reason for the answer.

Let the reader return to that healing of the wound. The writer states that something was done to take away that inflammation, and surely would call on doctors for a conference or consultation; the members called on some of their brethren that they had confidence in and who knew the best cure. The writer will mention some of the well known brothers that helped to kill the disease and cure the wound caused by the Spotlight Union, and if there is space enough will give you a little idea of the way it was done.

These are just a few, and the others will be mentioned in the next chat, or Part II, issued next week. Pres. Robert Goldblatt is well known for his part of the work; Brother James Daisie also has a record that can not be matched; Brother Robt. Levy did his share, likewise Brothers Epstein, Spinola, Theo. Ridder, S. Caplan, John Rickards, B. A. Freedman, James Girvan and others who will be mentioned in the next issue and what work they have done to benefit the conditions of this organization, Local No. 1, and the moving picture operator in general.

As the readers well know the work which was done by Robt. Goldblatt in the past, such as representing the operators at the various conventions, and helping in the battle for justice I will proceed with Brother James Daisie, who is or has been called the fighting Italian. The brother is proud of the name he has been given, and will continue his fighting for justice. He was a charter member of the ex-Auxiliary and one of the organizers of the M. P. M. O. U. No. 1 of New York. It can be said of him that he has brought more members into the Operators Union No. 1 than any twenty brothers together. In fact, at the last meeting of the old year, which was December 23, 1912, Brother Daisie was instrumental in bringing fifteen (15) new members into the union, and they were obligated at that meeting. Ten of the number were members who resigned from the new branch of No. 35. The members are informed that on account of the hard work which Brother Daisie has been doing in the past two weeks he has broken down from the strain, and owing to the rainy weather at the time he made many calls at the various theatres with the business representative to speak to the operators. Brother Daisie is now confined to his bed with a very irritable cold, and it is feared that pneumonia may set in. The business representative visits him daily, and the brothers who are aware of the illness of Brother Daisie pray for a speedy recovery, as such work which was accomplished by him can not be very easily duplicated.

The next regular meeting of the Moving Picture Machine Operators Union No. 1 of New York will be held on Monday, January 6, 1913, at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street, New York, at 12 o'clock midnight. All members are requested to be present.

* * * *

Get ready, boys, for the time is near at hand. February 10, 1913, is the date of the entertainment and ball of the Moving Picture Machine Operators Union No. 1 of New York at Palm Garden, 58th street, near Lexington avenue. Some music. Lemlein's Hippodrome Band. Talk about the fun? Well, there will be lots of that, and just picture Mr. John Bunny leading the grand march with Miss Pearl White. Two of the most popular pictureplay artists, and the many others that will be a surprise to you. Get busy, boys, and secure tickets at the office of the Union, 133 Third avenue, near Fourteenth stret, New York.

RALPH KNASTER, Business Representative.

WATCH FUTURE ANNOUNCEMENTS

THE MOST STIRRING ANIMAL DRAMA EVER PRODUCED

BEASTS OF THE JUNGLE

A thrilling animal drama with a lion, tiger, elephant, monkey and parrot in the leading roles. The only animal picture ever staged in which the players appear in scenes with the beasts. The climax shows a stirring struggle between a man and a lion. Vinnie Burns shows remarkable pluck in a scene with the tiger.

THE QUESTIONS OF CENSORSHIP

THE word "Censor" is one of the most galling words that can be said to an American citizen. It implies something altogether contrary to the spirit of American freedom. It implies that America is not free and gives one the thought of Germany, which has the police censor conduct, opinions and speech. It suggests France, where the Commissioner of Police interferes with a man spending his money beyond his means. It suggests Russia, where every newspaper received from abroad comes under the eye of the censor who blackens out all mention of anything that treats of liberty of the subjects, or freedom of speech regarding the Czar or the government, or anything that will elevate the poor downtrodden Russian.

If a censorship is necessary for the films, it is also necessary for the stage, both legitimate and vaudeville. It is more than necessary for the yellow press which makes such glaring headlines of the vice squad, but my contention is that a censorship board is not necessary at all, so far as Cinematography is concerned, because as a rule the public are the best critics, and what they do not like is never exhibited a second time. I quite agree with Mayor Gaynor, and believe he was in the right vetoing the ordinance for the censorship of the pictures. Means are already employed to keep immoral and suggestive films off the screen, and it would be a good thing for the public taste if many plays and scenes that are not indecent but merely coarse and vulgar could be excluded from the films, the legitimate and the vaudeville stages, but a censorship of the desires and tastes of the public is almost impossible, and utterly undesired in this country. Educate and train the people, and then a general improvement of the popular taste will follow which would not depend upon the services of official or unofficial censor boards.

Our article of December 21st brought forth the following from Mr. Collier, and I have much pleasure in publishing the other side of the question:

In your issue of December 21st is a statement characterizing the National Board of Censorship as "subsidized by the manufacturers, who, as they pay the piper, consequently call the tune." As this is wholly incorrect we would greatly appreciate the publication of the facts.

You will note from enclosed report of the National Board of Censorship that no voting member of the board receives compensation directly or indirectly and that no member has any interest in the motion picture business. You will note likewise that the board is controlled by ten civic agencies in New York, who, among them, expend annually several hundred thousand dollars in disinterested public work.

You will note that the trade contributions, devoted to clerical and executive work exclusively, aggregate only about $7,500 a year; that the largest salary paid is $2,000 a year; that no secretary votes on films.

It is unfortunate that the public press, which is often inimical to the motion picture art, quite continuously misunderstands the work of the National Board, but it is still more unfortunate that an established trade journal, published in the interest of the motion picture art, should misunderstand the work of the National Board. The board exists at the request of the trade interests. It does its work without discrimination for all of the trade groups; it represents an extraordinary effort on the part of disinterested people to defend the motion picture business against foolish attack and to make it worthy of public support.

In addition to this I wish to state that as I was the first to bring the matter of the censorship board before the late Sprague Smith, I certainly am not opposed to any agency that will prevent the exhibition of illogical films on the screen. Herewith follows the financial statement as issued by the censorship board:

Statement of the Treasurer of the People's Institute as to receipts and disbursements on behalf of the National Board of Censorship, April 1, 1911—Oct. 1, 1912.

Received from J. J. Kennedy, on behalf of the licensed manufacturers	$9,000.00
Received from the Motion Picture Distributing and Sales Company, on behalf of independent manufacturers	900.00
Contribution toward Secretary's traveling expenses, from civic societies in Wisconsin, etc	148.80
Contributions from various individuals	38.00
Rebate from New York Telephone Company	11.21
Total receipts	$10,098.01

The above sum was transferred by the People's Institute to the National Board of Censorship of Motion Pictures and disbursed by the General Committee of that Board.

V. EVERET MACY,
Treasurer, the People's Institute.

The above figures will speak for themselves without any further explanation.

This question of censorship is agitating the minds of the Australian film manufacturers from whom I have received letters this week, and also press notices of the fight that the Greater T. D. Williams Co. is putting up against the goody, goody people there. England, especially London, is having hard work to fight the censorship boards there, and the same conditions exist in one or two other countries, chiefly in the large cities. The cry also comes from our own country, from Cincinnati, Cleveland, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Denver, Seattle, San Francisco, Boston and others, and, as I stand in my editorial above referred to, I believe the Exhibitors' League is the right party to take this matter in charge, and purge the industry from everything of a vulgar or low nature. I will be glad to hear the opinions of exhibitors, or those in authority entitled to know, regarding the value of the censorship board of some of the pictures they are now exhibiting.

Alfred H. Saunders.

FORTHCOMING EXPOSITION IN CINEMATOGRAPHY

One of the novel and attractive features of the forthcoming First International Exposition of the Motion Picture Art, to be held at the Grand Central Palace the week of July 7, 1913, will be four "model" moving picture theatres, which are to be erected on the mezzanine floor of the palace.

These theatres will be examples of what the ideal moving picture playhouse should be, such as every exhibitor should be able to boast of, and if this were possible at the present time, there would not be the adverse criticism that appears in certain quarters against some of the theatres.

The "model" theatres will be replete with every modern appliance known to the moving picture industry which makes up a perfect equipment, so that exhibitors from all over the world who will attend the exposition may see the latest in theatrical construction, decorations and accessories. Four different decorative firms have volunteered to supply each theatre with separate and distinct fronts of elaborate design. Other leading manufacturers have agreed to furnish the most modern ventilating systems, the best lighting effects, the recognized leading screens, machines, chairs, ticket boxes, etc. Different manufacturers will contribute to the equipment of each theatre, no one being allowed to supply more than one article, thus insuring a larger variety.

In one theatre films released by the Universal Company will be exhibited exclusively, in the second those of the Film Supply Company of America will preside, in the third the General Film Companies, while the fourth will be devoted to the products of manufacturers not allied with any combine. Different machines will be used in each house as well.

The theatres will occupy floor space of approximately 80 by 20 feet and the admission is to be absolutely free.

The able committee in charge of the arrangements have made rapid strides in their work and are to be congratulated upon their excellent progress thus far.

The First International Exposition of the Motion Picture Art is destined to be the greatest event in the history of cinematography, appealing, as it will, alike to the manufacturers, exhibitors, exchange men, players, directors, and even the moving picture fans, all of whom will be treated to a veritable feast for the eye when they look upon the remarkable display of everything relating to the new art to which they are devoted.

THE MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

Ohio is certainly making great preparations for the convention to be held in Columbus, at the Southern Hotel, on the 21st and 22nd of January 1913. The state officers' office is flooded with letters and inquiries for space, etc. Three hundred and thirty-two members of the State League of Ohio, State Branch No. 1, have already written that they will be at the convention, without fail. Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2 has made reservation at the Southern Hotel for thirty-five rooms. Manufacturers who desire to give an exhibition will please take notice that the Southern Hotel is going to be crowded with exhibitors. There have already been sixteen exhibitors inquiring if moving picture machines will be shown, and there are inquiries coming in in regard to accessories of all kinds, as a large number of exhibitors who will attend the convention are waiting to see the various makes and kinds of things they desire. This will be a most profitable convention for those who make exhibits. President M. A. Neff left Cincinnati Friday night, arriving in Toledo Saturday morning, and held an enthusiastic local meeting at room 50, Boody Hotel. Toledo is in line and will be at the state convention with a strong delegation. Mr. Neff will go from Toledo to Columbus to confer with the local committee which is preparing to take a picture and getting everything ready for the big meeting. Gaumont will take a picture of the parade of the motion picture exhibitors and the visit of the exhibitors to pay their respects to Governor Cox, on his special invitation. This will be a feature picture, as it is expected all the state officers, Senators, Representatives and a large number of prominent exhibitors will assemble in front of the capitol of Ohio and be photographed by Gaumont's special camera man. The Chamber of Commerce is assisting local committees in making the convention a grand success. There will be a great deal of competition as to the delegates who will be elected to attend the national convention to be held in New York in July. A special committee has been appointed to entertain the ladies, and while the gentlemen are in executive session the ladies will be beautifully entertained. There is nothing talked of only the coming Columbus convention by the exhibitors.

All roads will lead to Columbus on the 21st and 22nd. Big preparations are being made by special committees appointed for the entertainment of the national vice-presidents, who will arrive in time to attend the big banquet on the evenings of the 22nd to the 23rd of January, when they will go into executive session, as there will be a large amount of executive business to be transacted.

EDISON TALKING PICTURES

At a demonstration of the Edison Kinetophone given in the laboratory of the inventor at West Orange on Friday, January 3rd, a marvelous revelation of the possibilities of synchronization in the production of moving pictures was witnessed. As the shadow figures moved about on the screen, every sound, absolutely timed was emitted from the Kinetophone in conjunction with the happenings on the screen.

That the Kinetophone of Edison is one of the great inventions of the age goes without saying. It is surely destined to be one of the most important adjuncts of the poor man's theatre. In Mr. Edison's own words:

"It will in a measure take the place of the actual flesh-and-blood play, for how much better it will be to sit and watch a play where the scenery is not painted canvas, but the real city street, the real farmyard.

"As to its historic value, that can only be guessed. The inauguration of a president or any other important event can be preserved in act and sound for the future. Orators can address their audiences while sitting at their own firesides. Actors and singers can do the same. In fact, there seems to be no end to the possibilities of this invention."

THE SPECTRE BRIDEGROOM

(Two-reel Eclair, January 23)

The above is a most interesting and unique presentation in pictures of a story interwoven with old Hallowe'en legends. The tale is laid at the close of the Revolutionary War.

Hilda Von Landshort, a beautiful young girl and only daughter of Baron Von Landshort, plays Hallowe'en pranks with a number of other young people. The apple peel thrown over her shoulder forms itself into the two letters V. A. The baron then tells the story of how in her babyhood she has been betrothed to a young man by the name of Van Altenberg. Later on, when the time approaches for the formal celebration of the betrothal and the young bridegroom is expected, an accident occurs—he and the friend accompanying him are attacked by brigands and Van Altenberg is killed. Herman, the friend, hastens to the house of the baron to tell the sad news, but the baron in the excitement mistakes Herman for Van Altenberg and refuses to listen to his tale. He is seated by Hilda at the feast, and, to find a way out of his predicament, tells that he is a spectre, the ghost of Van Altenberg, who has died on the way. The two young people fall in love with one another. Some interesting scenes in a witch's habitation take place, and the two are eventually united in marriage.

This film is most artistic in production and unique in subject.

THE INCORPORATED ASSOCIATION OF KINEMATOGRAPH MANUFACTURERS, LTD., OF ENGLAND, OBJECT TO ENGLISH EXPOSITION

London, W. C., December 23, 1912.

Editor Moving Picture News.

Dear Sir: At a meeting of the Kinematograph Manufacturers' Association held last week, the question of the proposed International Kinematograph Exhibition was discussed, and Mr. E. Schofield, the secretary, attended, to fully explain the scheme. After very careful consideration, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

"That after due deliberation the Association of Kinematograph Manufacturers, Ltd., disapproves of the proposed International Kinematograph Exhibition (1913) and cannot permit the use of its name in any connection whatsoever with the said scheme propounded by Mr. E. Schofield."

Yours faithfully,
Per pro J. BROOKE WILKINSON,
Secretary.

The Film Supply Company has arranged to add to its curriculum several new brands of films, which are as follows: All Star, Prairie, Monitor, Monarch, Anchor and Ammex. Solax, Gaumont, Itala split-reel comedies, Great Northern, Lux, Comet, Gaumont Weekly and Great Events will continue to be a part of their program.

THE DAUGHTER OF HEAVEN

This beautiful musical play it was my pleasure to witness a short while ago at the Century Theatre, Broadway and Sixty-second street, New York, and it is well worth a visit by visitors to the city. The plot is a little obscure to the general understanding, but the scenic effects are beautiful. The principal object of my visit there was to hear and examine a Wurlitzer Hope-Jones Unit Orchestra. It is a three manual organ, without diapason work, and it is orchestral to the last degree. Double touch on each of the three manuals and on the pedals, pizzicato touch on all. It possesses string and orchestral reed tones, and has several qualities never before heard either in orchestra or organ—xylophone, glockenspiel, musical sleigh bells, cathedral chimes, etc., etc., as well as tambourine, castanets, drums of all kinds and such like traps. These latter are enclosed in swell boxes.

All of the above may, to an organist, read very sweet and concise, and they may understand it better than I do, but I want to say that of all the magnified hurdy-gurdys of my boyhood days, this was the greatest, and the puzzle to me is why are most of the theatres doing away with their beautiful musical instruments and orchestras, which have life and vigor and power, also harmony, for music put in a box of tinkling sounds and cymbals. For my part I prefer listening to a good orchestra properly balanced discoursing sweet music than I would to a musical box. I do not want to detract from the mechanical device of this Wurlitzer Unit, but I do say that it was the most mechanical sounding instrument I ever heard. There was no charm at all about the instrument, such as one gets by observing the conductor with his baton and every man working in unison with him, when each unit of the orchestra seems to be part and parcel of the beautiful music they are turning out, each one with his varied interpretation of the various sounds emanating from the violin or other instrument fully under his own control. For the saving of money and the averting of musical strikes, the organ may fit in, but otherwise I do not know why exhibitors and large theatres should disband their pianist, or organist, or orchestra for a mechanical box giving mechanical sounds.

A GLANCE AT THE KINEMACOLOR VISITORS' REGISTER

Every writer knows what inspiration may be gained from the simplest things—but a visit to the private exhibition room in the palatial offices of the Kinemacolor Company of America proved to be more than a surprise.

In glancing over the list of visitors registered as having enjoyed the views lately could be mentioned many quite startling facts—among them, that on Friday afternoon, December 20th, the guests of the company included Miss Mary Garden, Adeline Genee and the Hon. Oscar S. Strauss.

From its beginning Kinemacolor has been associated with royalty and persons of the highest prominence—the first great success made of pictures in this marvelous process were views of the coronation of King George and Queen Mary of England. Other European monarchs to be thus perpetuated to the future are King Alphonse of Spain, the Emperor of Germany, and ex-King Manuel of Portugal.

In our own country President Taft, President-elect Wilson and many other notables have been "Kinemacolored"—while a further glance at the visitors' register shows that Colonel Theodore Roosevelt has been a guest within a few days.

Private performances for royalty have been innumerable with Kinemacolor—but looking at that famous register will convince one that nowhere in the world can be found more distinguished audiences than the little groups who visit that private theatre on the sixth floor of 1600 Broadway.

THE LOBBY

By S. J. Newman, Secretary and Treasurer of The Newman Manufacturing Company, Cincinnati and New York

I have been requested by the editor of this publication to contribute a series of articles dwelling upon the "heart" of every theatre, "The Lobby." Before I commence, I must ask Mr. Reader to refrain from criticising too harshly my ability as a writer, for I'll admit before I'm accused that I never was cut out for one. However, I will, to the best of my ability, endeavor to show you the value of your lobby, and I believe that before I have concluded my last article I will have converted a great many exhibitors to my way of thinking, and as a result many will profit thereby. Of course, I do not expect my views to coincide with those of all my readers, but I'll come mighty close to it.

There is no questioning the fact that the lobby is a vital asset to every theatre. Show me a fine lobby display and nine out of ten times I'll show you a theatre taking in the coin and showing to packed houses. Show me a poor lobby display, and it's a ten-to-one shot that I can show you a struggling exhibitor who is fighting against odds to keep his pocketbook from appearing like a steam roller had done its worst. It is the latter class of exhibitors to whom I am directing this article. I know that by perseverance I'll succeed in arousing some of them. Mayhap some of them may feel like the Irishman did in a little story I heard, something like this: An English clergyman turned to a Scotchman and asked him. "What would you be were you not a Scot?" The Scotchman replied, "Why, an Englishman, of course." The clergyman turned to the gentleman from Ireland and asked him, "And what would you be were you not an Irishman?" The man thought for a moment, and said, "I'd be ashamed of meself!"

Getting back to the subject again, it is essential for every theatre to make an attractive lobby display, the same as a shoe store must make an attractive window display. How long would it be before a store proprietor would have to hang up the much-dreaded sign, "Closed by order of the court," if he did not continue to make neat and attractive window displays? Not very long! So it is with the theatre. The lobby should be decorated as frequently as necessary, and, above all things, the posters should be neatly and attractively shown in brass frames on brass easels. The accompanying illustrations show a brass easel and frame which are used by hundreds upon hundreds of theatres throughout the country. Six easels and six frames should be used by every theatre having a lobby large enough to accommodate that many, as three posters of reels showing and three posters of reels coming should be at all times prominently displayed in the lobby. Displaying posters of reels coming is very necessary, as it keeps up the interest of the patrons and causes many of them to await with expectancy the picture plays coming. Where the lobby is too shallow to accommodate six easels and frames, then brass frames hung up on the wall is the next best thing to do. The investment in these frames and easels is comparatively insignificant, and it will pay back the principal in a very short time. Throw away the cheap wooden frames. Do not paste posters against the wall or suspend them in a row in front over the entrance. Do not try to save money by using gilt frames in imitation of brass frames. Do not hesitate in making your lobby attractive—displaying your posters and photos effectively in brass frames—and I'll venture to say that the exhibitor who follows this advise (even though it might take his last dollar) will say that it is the best investment he ever made.

It Is Rather Pitiful

TO quote Mr. L. S. McCloskey, editor for the Lubin Manufacturing Company, "the whole thing would be a huge joke if it weren't so pitiful." Mr. McCloskey refers to certain exhibits which have been placed in our possession as "horrible examples" of the methods pursued by picture play correspondence schools. Editor McCloskey is one of the most able and experienced script editors. Better yet, he is among those honest and conscientious literary workers who have the best interests of the struggling authors at heart and who wish them honest success, because he appreciates that a step forward for them means general advancement for the moving picture story. McCloskey appreciates that our work is as much for the best interests of the editor as for the writer, and we thank him for convincing material, proving the pernicious methods of the "institutes" and the "universities." Mr. McCloskey writes:

> I am sending you herewith some letters written by "graduates" and "students" of picture play correspondence schools. I wish I could send the scenarios that came with them, but, of course, they had to be returned to the poor students and graduates. I think these will be better than any article, for they show from what source these parasitic "schools" draw their sustenance. I've read the articles which have been appearing in the Moving Picture News upon this question, and anything that I could write would be but repetition of the facts set forth in them. These letters are just a few that I happened to have saved. We've others even worse. The whole thing would be a huge joke if it weren't so pitiful. Several of the letters, you will see, are from "school grafters" themselves, who make up in nerve what they lack in brains. More power to you.

We shall publish some of these letters, out of charity omitting the authors' names, and we deem Mr. McCloskey's contribution to our campaign against correspondence school pikers of value to the army of script writers.

Truly

The above letter to Mr. McCloskey was written in ink on a half sheet of foolscap paper.

Dear Sir:

Here is a play wich I send you intittled Back On The Plains. I'm a graduate from The ——— Institute and I know you desire my mms. typewritten. but this is my first offer to sell my plays. so if you would please help me out in this one and the rest I be able to have typewritten as I can't afford is not but if you buy this one. This play would be talked about if Cleo Ridgely and Jack Standing took the leading parts. but the rest of the players as well liked.

The above letter to Mr. McCloskey was written in violet ink on legal cap paper.

Editor The Lubin Co:

I am from the ——— School of Journalism. Suppose you give my stuff a chance?

"The Heart Specialist's Heart" was the title of the script submitted with the above letter to Editor McCloskey. The letter was written in ink on a scrap of paper 4x6 inches. The author failed to give his home address. A well-known Eastern university conducts the "College of Journalism" mentioned by the writer.

Atlantic City, N. J., August 13, 1912.

Kind Sir: i have on hand a very good story which i have ritten from real life and i consulted the ——— school and they wanted $30 dollars to teach me how to place together my story but I do not think the story Requires any better Placing together so i thought i would consult your Company about it.

Mrs. ———

Written on a post card.

Dear Sirs:

We have finished taken a course of lessons for writing plays for moving pictures and want to write them for you. We are ready to begin in the work as soon as we hear from you. We have studied and practiced the lessons through and expect to write uptodate plays from the begining. please answer at once so we may know. address

Carl Junction, Mo.

The above communication, written on a post card, was received by the Lubin Company.

The above letters from "graduates" are among hundreds received by Editor McCloskey, of the Lubin Company, and convincingly show the knowledge of picture play writing imparted by the correspondence "colleges."

Another Side to the Game

Then there is another side to the correspondence school game. "Lessons" in many instances are boldly taken from standard text-books and the instructions issued by several film companies. Here is just one instance:

Philadelphia, May 11, 1912.

Lubin Mfg. Co.,

Editor of Scenarios,

Dear Sir: Would beg your permission to extract a few facts from your folder that you sent us some time previous. Also your scenario entitled "A Battle of Wealth." We will fully appreciate the above information if you grant us our request, as we are about to write a set of instructions on "How To Write Motion Picture Plots."

Very Truly

Needless to remark that this request was promptly turned down by Editor McCloskey. This request was rather remarkable, for it has been the custom to "crib" such information without even notifying the originators of text-books or folders.

We Have the Goods

It may as well be stated that we have the names and addresses of every writer mentioned in the above correspondence as well as other letters from various "schools" and their unfortunate "graduates." Lack of space prohibits their reproduction at this time. However, we have further interesting proof of the policies of certain "institutes" and "colleges" which will be made public when the proper time comes. We wish to impress on the minds of script writers that the best editors, as well as trade journal scribes, are strictly against the correspondence school system. Proof of that fact will be discovered by statements printed in this Department. The attempt made on the part of certain "professors" and "faculties" to show that they were favored by the film manufacturing companies has been convincingly disproved by the Moving Picture News. The "colleges" are in disrepute and their activities have worked a great injustice to many. A closed market will be the ultimate result unless the situation is bettered.

Kalem Needs

The Kalem editor is only considering strong dramas of modern American life, full of action.

Universal Script Bureau

We are receiving many complaints regarding the Universal script reading bureau, Mecca building. Editor C. B. Hoadley is no longer connected with the central clearing house, and it is said that a lady is the sole occupant of the office, and that she is surrounded with bales of scripts. Authors complain that they can get no action on their scripts even when accompanied by return envelopes. Thomas Bedding, former editor of the Universal Weekly, is out with an attack on the glowing statements contained in a card recently addressed by the Universal to script writers. However, the Universal management states that the central script bureau will soon be placed on a systematic basis. This will be pleasing news to contributors.

Don't Be a Fool

When we say "Don't be a fool," we mean do not use foolscap for writing your scripts. If you wish your favorite editor to tear his hair, write a script on foolscap paper, on both sides, and with lead pencil. It makes editors shudder. Typewrite all manuscripts; use 8x11 paper; keep your synopsis within 300 words; write your home address plainly, and don't tell the editor of your personal troubles along with the script. He has troubles of his own.

Setting a Price

Despite the fact that many of the "associations" and "faculties" teach the student to put a price on his script, don't do it. Maybe the script for which the beginner demands "twenty-five dollars" is not worth that sum. Maybe it is worth $30. You lose. Send to first-class concerns and trust in editorial judgment. If the price offered is not enough, write to the editor. Perhaps the matter can be satisfactorily arranged. We admit that the present schedule of prices for scripts is not munificent but we believe prices will advance materially before many moons.

Editing Your Own Stuff

You can learn to edit your own stuff. Why have another do it for you? When you complete a manuscript, bluepencil it. Let the story get cold, take it up in a week and go over it with an unprejudiced eye. Cut out the unessential matter and rewrite it again. You will be surprised frequently that you did not notice this and that before. It is good practice for you and meets with editorial approval, too.

This Is Not Comedy

Do not try to write "comedy." Write comedy. Some of the alleged funny stuff inflicted upon the long-suffering picture play "fan" these days is fierce. Because you can cut capers in the parlor, and the girls say "you are just too funny for anything," is no proof that you can write the kind of comedy that "goes over." This knock-down-and-drag-out-stuff being liberally released by some concerns is becoming terribly tiresome. But worse yet is the comedy of bad taste. We saw one the other evening which burlesqued death. Someone hung a bunch of crepe outside a door. Mighty funny joke, that. Then everyone bought flowers and went into the home and wept over a tramp who had gone to sleep in a bed with the covers pulled over his head. The comedy ended with the usual chase. There was a lady in that audience who had recently lost her brother. Some of the stuff pulled off in that "comedy" was fearfully natural. The lady left the theatre and went home. She was not entertained. Many others did not think it funny. Good taste is essential for comedies. You use it. Directors sometimes lack good taste.

THE HUMAN VULTURE
(Gaumont Feature)

The above depicts very splendidly the terrible greed and indifference to the value of human life, of large corporations, and individuals.

"The Human Vulture" in the picture is a man at the head of a mining corporation. The Bressac Mine is up for sale, and the General Mining Company is about to buy it. Just as the deal is about to be made and contract signed, a telegram reaches President Stone, which acquaints him with the fact, that infiltrations which have appeared in the bottom of the mine made descent into the shaft dangerous. Disregarding the message he practically rushes business arrangements in an endeavor to close the deal and get his money out before any disaster occurs.

The manager at the mines comes to him to plead with him to stop the work in the endangered tunnel, but he brushes him angrily aside. The result is that while President Stone is entertaining his guests, the negotiators from the General Mining Company, at dinner, the underground stream breaks into the mine, causing a terrible disaster. President Stone, on his way to the mine in his automobile, is thrown out and seriously injured. He is carried into the home of the head foreman, who has been killed in the mine, is left in the room with the dead body, and, awakening and discovering the situation, dies.

The story in its production is tremendously sensational.

THE year 1913 in filmland promises to be a momentous one. It is confidently expected that the industry will make even more rapid strides than has marked its advancement in the past. Educationally, morally and politically, the moving picture will gain in importance during the year to come. The past year has witnessed many important improvements in the art, and many meritorious productions marked the year 1912. The year was significant also in radical changes among the manufacturers, and there are now four great distributing agencies. The year 1912 also saw the rapidly growing importance of the two, three, four and five-reel feature productions and the advent into filmland of actors and actresses having national fame. Many vexing legal questions were decided and, to sum up, the year was one of great importance to cinematography. The Sunday closing question, the war in many cities against the so-called crime pictures and sensational posters, the recognition of the moving picture films by press, pulpit and educational bodies was also of significance.

What will the new year bring forth? Let us venture the optimistic prediction that 1913 will early see the increasing dignity of the moving picture and the added prosperity of the manufacturer and exhibitor. This is the devout wish of the Moving Picture News, and the policy of this journal will, as in the past, be that of the defender of all legitimate details of the industry, fearless advocacy of justice and fair play for goth manufacturer and exhibitor, and a stronger demand for clean, uplifting pictures and educational films.

The year 1912 saw a sudden awakening of religious denominations to the educational importance of the moving picture and the possibilities of the Biblical picture. Many churches installed the moving picture machine, and in various sections of the country moving pictures of Biblical, scenic and educational subjects are commonly shown in houses of worship. We venture the prediction that in 1913 the Scriptures will be more freely drawn upon by the thoughtful manufacturer who is looking for the uplift and dignity of Cinematography. Although many excellent Biblical portrayals were released in 1912, yet the Book of Books has scarcely been touched. What a wealth of sacred history is at the command of those editors and directors interested in Biblical lore! Faithful and dignified productions are essential and will prove of worth.

* * * *

The past year was also marked by the realization of powerful magazine and newspaper editors that the moving picture was a subject of universal interest and one to be reckoned with. During the latter months of 1912 no less than seven widely read magazines and weekly periodicals devoted many pages to the moving picture industry. These articles were written by experts and others, and were liberally embellished by photographs and drawings. Without exception, every article was encouraging and proved a great aid to the advancement of the industry. The publicity was the more important because not one of the magazines or newspapers drew advertising patronage from moving picture sources. Other articles are in course of preparation and will be published early in 1913.

The advent of prominent actors and actresses into filmland was also a feature of the past twelve months. Rejane, Bernhardt, Goodwin, Mrs. Fiske, James K. Hackett, James O'Neill and many others posed for the moving pictures. Two years ago these and other stars of the stage would have scorned proposals from moving picture manufacturers. Many other theatrical stars will be seen in the pictures during the coming year, and we predict that even David Warfield and Maude Adams will be seen in films before 1914 rolls around. More natural acting and more careful staging marked the work of the studios in 1912. There was also a marked decrease in the "problem" stories, and every editor and director seems to be on the alert to corral the story of the every-day people. There promises to be a greater number of releases of topicals and educationals during the coming year.

The Sunday closing question remained undecided in many states with the close of 1912. There are many details to be taken into consideration, but as a whole, the exhibitors seem to have the best of it. They have caught the right idea, that of eliminating all illustrated songs, posters, etc., and of showing only those pictures appropriate to the seventh day. Mrs. Langtry, in the London (England) Lantern Weekly, is quoted as favoring the Sunday moving picture theatre and the closing of the other theatres on the Sabbath. She says: "If a certain number of people must forego rest on Sunday in order that a large number of other people may enjoy themselves, then let the number of workers be as small as possible. The picture places are run on the minimum of labor, and run by that class of labor which can take its holidays on week days—a thing which artists cannot do. Therefore, my feeling distinctly is that, for the sake of the public, the picture shows should be kept open on Sunday and, for the sake of the artists, the theatres and music halls should remain closed."

There are many details in the pictures which will undoubtedly be improved upon during the new year. Some manufacturers have not as yet eliminated their trade-marks from the doors, walls, trees and other settings in the pictures. Some way should be devised to forego this custom, which so frequently spoils an otherwise artistic setting. Then the art of making up is sadly neglected by certain moving picture actresses and actors. Too much makeup has ruined many an otherwise convincing character delineation in the past year. We know one actor who seemingly cannot don a realistic wig or beard. The disguise is invariably ill-fitting. A bold sailor boy, or hardy woodchopper, clad in the rough and ready, too often comes forth with spotlessly white arms and hands, and many of the ladies appear too chalkily white in the picture plays. These are little details, but important in the general effect. More attention should be paid to correct grammar and spelling in many subtitles shown in the pictures, and all exhibitors should make it a rule to give their audiences an opportunity to read the main title of the picture play on the screen. In nine theatres out of ten the film is invariably jumped to the first scene, with the audience in ignorance as to what it is all about. These details and others can be easily remedied.

* * * *

During the eleven months to come, an effort should also be made to obtain more convincing comedy themes. Many producers claim it cannot be done. It cannot with $10 and $20 as the customary prices for comedy. If the manufacturer will offer $50 as the minimum price for good comedy, the supply will be increased and satisfactory stories will be received. There was too much slap-stick comedy of the chase variety during the past year. A few of the manufacturers put out genteel and delightful comic releases, but they were in the minority. The ridiculing of national peculiarities was also a vogue that should be checked. The Irish policemen, the Dutch sausage maker, the Hebrew pawnbroker and the French pastry cook were too numerous. The film producers are beginning to avoid this form of "comedy," and with excellent judgment. Nothing can be gained by poking exaggerated fun at the national peculiarities of individuals.

The moving picture trade journals and magazines are worthy of some credit for the rapid advancements made by Cinematography during the year 1912. We have read them all, and, without exception, the editorial policies have been for the elevation and prosperity of all branches of the industry. The editors of these weekly and monthly publications have often labored against pressure within and without, but steadfastly they have continued their policies of onward and upward, and the enviable standard being achieved by the moving picture industry is largely due to the efforts of the moving picture scribes. The leaders in all branches of the industry should feel proud that the true interests of the profession are being looked after by such an intelligent and intellectual class of writers.

And in conclusion, the Moving Picture News wishes to thank its readers and patrons. The year 1912 was the most prosperous and encouraging ever experienced in the history of this publication. The subscription list has doubled and thousands of copies of the News go into refined homes. The News cannot ask for a more prosperous year to come, but nevertheless, the signs augur increased influence for the Moving Picture News in 1913.

KINEMACOLOR, THE CHILDREN'S THEATRE AND BEN GREET

Educational color films of the Kinemacolor Company of America are one of the most important features of the entertainment offered at the new Children's Theatre atop of the Century Theatre, New York, and the lecturer who explains these films to the children is no less a personage than Ben Greet, best known to Americans as the producer of "Everyman" and of outdoor Shakespeare.

As is natural, the films chosen by the Kinemacolor Company for exhibition are those especially interesting to children and embrace many nature studies. In lecturing on these, Mr. Greet is particularly happy, for it was his love for nature which led him to present "As You Like It" in woodland scenes such as Shakespeare must have had in mind when he wrote of Rosalind and made her immortal.

From time to time the Kinemacolor films at the Children's Theatre will be changed and fresh subjects introduced.

In speaking of the plans for the Kinemacolor films in connection with the Children's Theatre, George Tyler, of Liebler & Co., who manage the Children's Theatre, said in a recent interview:

"In addition, our performances start with a half hour of Kinemacolor pictures, all of an educational character, actual lessons in manual training, history and almost every subject where we can show action progress. We will show the construction of toys, automobiles, skyscrapers, houses, chairs, lamps, steamships, airships, engines. We will travel to England, France, Russia, Turkey, China, Japan, South America, Africa, California, New Orleans, the Philippines, the Great Lakes, the mines in Idaho, Colorado, the ranches, the plains, the North Pole, the buffaloes, the Indians, the tunnels in Europe, the war in the East, the sunny coast of the Mediterranean, the Land of the Midnight Sun. Really, there is nothing we shall not traverse or encompass in our pictures."

"Might be a good thing for grown-ups," I interposed.

"There will be no law keeping them away, but the parties aren't for them."

Simplex Machines in Keith's Theatre

The R. D. Marson Moving Picture Company, 597 Washington Street, Boston, has just installed in Keith's Theatre, Portland, Me., two Simplex moving picture machines. This will be one of the finest moving picture theatres in that part of the country and is a credit to the industry. Mr. Marson also reports many other sales of Simplex projectors throughout New England.

CHILD LABOR
Majestic release January 14th.

Ammex Film Company with the Film Supply

The Ammex Film Company, with studios and factory in San Diego, Cal., and with offices at 145 West Forty-fifth street, this city, are now affiliated with the Film Supply Company of America and will, from now on, make their shipments through that company. They have for the past four or five months been releasing independent of any faction, and the reputation they acquired during that time as manufacturers of Western pictures, will undoubtedly be of great benefit to them in their new association.

The Santa Marguerita Ranch, which comprises 365,000 acres of the most beautiful and picturesque part of Southern California, with its great herds of cattle and its large number of range-riders, will be the site where the most of their pictures will be taken. The privilege and concessions of taking pictures on this ranch are held exclusively by them.

Some little time ago the Mexican Government granted to the Ammex people the exclusive rights of taking pictures in lower California. This is quite an advantage to any film manufacturer, as the peninsula affords a very beautiful, natural scenic condition that never has been utilized in making moving pictures.

SCENE FROM "MEMORIES"
"Ammex" release February 6th.

In San Diego they have large and spacious studios, stockades, horses and stables, and in fact their facilities for making Western pictures are on a par with any other film company on the Pacific Coast.

The first release through the Film Supply Company will be on January 23rd. The subject of this release will be "Love and Circumstances."

"Punch" Comedy Company to Go to Jacksonville

"Punch" Comedy Company, releasing a comedy split reel every Thursday, leaves for Jacksonville on January 25th, via steamship Iroquois. Director Charles Weston, Herbert Rice, Arthur Finn, Fred Saums, Lord Lilford, Virginia Westbrook and Alice Inward are now booked to sail, and will be reinforced by other notables before they sail. Mr. Weston has made arrangements with the captain of the Iroquois to allow him to take several scenes during the voyage.

Lubin Banquet

Siegmund Lubin, the motion picture film manufacturer, was the guest of honor last Monday at the Progress Club, Philadalphia. Many appreciative speeches were made to which the motion picture king feelingly responded. The occasion was emphasized by the presentation of a large silver loving cup mounted with deer horns, inscribed:

Presented to Siegmund Lubin, by his friends, January 6, 1913.

PICTURE MUSIC

By ERNST LUZ

The following is an extract from a letter written to the New York Times by Arthur Farwell, supervisor of municipal concerts, and from its tone shows it to be inspired by the results of certain experiments made by Harry Porter Weld, of Clark University, to ascertain the exact effects of music upon the human consciousness.

(From New York Times of December 25th).

"Mr. Weld reports that his experiments, involving the recording of breathing and muscular reaction and the introspective experience of his subjects when listening to music, 'reveal the fact that the "music consciousness" is made up of a mass of kinesthetic and organic sensations, motor, vocal-motor, auditory, and visual imagery, numerous associations, many of which are irrelevant, affective and emotional processes, and various phenomena which have to do with intellectual enjoyment.' One person experimented upon 'plays with his tonal imagery.' Another sees changing scenes—a ball, a pageant, a stage play. One feels a strong tendency to move his head with the music, or to vocalize. Another finds pleasure in calling up the scene in which he last heard the same composition. Still another sees the pitch outline in graphic form. Others alternate between excitement and repose. Some find a purely analytical enjoyment, and still others find a 'symbolistic' interpretation of the music.

"In short, music appeals to the human consciousness, wherever it finds it alive and sensitive, according to the temperament of the hearer and the nature of the music, and the 'emotional,' as commonly understood and meant, is but one among many ways of that appeal, and not even a particularly prominent one. Music in an all-human symbol, offering its gifts to any region of the consciousness that will receive them. In this lies its great attribute of universality.

"Mr. Weld's observations are preliminary and special, not final. Having the whole gamut of the harp-strings of the consciousness, 'emotional' and otherwise, to play upon, music's final potency is in the fusing and synthesis of its effects, its capacity to set chaos in order, and lift order to a higher joy in itself.

"It may be urged that all these ways of music's appeal lead back again to emotion."

There is food for thought in this article, for while it deals with the very highest phase of musical imagination, that fact alone should make it interesting to those who have the future success of the moving picture and theatre at heart. You will note that in these experiments all the subjects underwent a certain process of emotion, still they all differed in the final result, which was caused by there being no concentration of thought, for the subjects were experimented upon with no view as to the final result, which result was dictated by the individual imagination of each subject. Nevertheless all the experiments proved that music does at all times appeal to emotion, and when human emotion is aroused, we search for the reason why, which, as a natural consequence, excites our imagination. Imaginations differ, music does not.

The following editorial in part, clipped from the same edition of the New York Times, written on the same subject, touches lightly on my above assertion:

"Beautiful pictures arose in the mind of one auditor. Another found his greatest pleasure in muscular reactions to the music. A third, who understood musical composition, studied the pieces as works of art. But in every case, while one impression was dominated and usually different from the experiences of others, all the complex factors of enjoyment were present in varying degrees, and by a shift of attention the hearer could easily pass from one typical procedure to another. Of course, the same group of imagery or of ideas was never conveyed by the music into the minds of all the auditors."

The imaginations of each of these subjects was in part controlled by their more or less advanced intellect or musical knowledge, for we note in all cases that the experiments lacked concentration of thought. These experiments were preliminary and are but the forerunners of others that will mean much to the musical enlightenment of the entire country. Herein you will find the greatest artistic success and educational value of the motion picture, one that will have a continuing value even greater in future generations.

Knowing that music emotionally affects all humanity to the extent of arousing their imagination, which differs in all, does it not seem plausible that with the combination of music and the picture, we obtain the highest ideals of both. The picture creating concentrated thought, the music making it more impressive, at the same time creating a toning for the theatre as well as exciting interest.

These experiments prove that the one feature most neglected, viz., music, is the greatest agitator of the present censorship of the picture theatre, for you may uniform your attendants, have beautiful fronts, extravagant displays and good pictures, but if the music is neglected the very atmosphere will suggest a cheapness far from commendable, and it will be impossible to attract the better element.

We note a great improvement in the pictures, which helps wonderfully in the setting of music to them. The method of continual interchanging scenes every 25 foot of film from the one extreme temperament to the other seems to have become ancient history, and we have to-day many dramas containing nothing violent. To continue and encourage such film productions, I would suggest to the picture player that he should not neglect them and because nothing violent or boisterous occurs play one tempo through the entire picture, for this in itself has a tendency to create an impression among the audience that the picture is common and is but put on to fill in. There are at least four points in each one of these pictures where you can effectively change your numbers and tempos, and when you properly change them, you will each time excite a new interest. It is true that it requires a finer intellect to locate the points in these pictures than in a cheap melodrama, but if you follow them with a view of study, it will come easy to you and when once mastered you will find it a pleasure to play them. The points may be located by the introduction of a new character, a change of action to some distant place or clime, a change from male to female character predominance, exterior scenes to interiors, sharp photography to soft-toned pictures, or changes in the financial, physical or romantic portrayal of your leading characters. Please don't waltz these pictures from beginning to end. It ruins your waltz as well as the picture.

MUSICAL PLOTS

By Ernest Luz.

A few rules governing their use.

The cues given will allow for natural ending of strains, unless "Leader" cue, in which case a quick segue should be made unless otherwise stated. Avoid Overtures and Potpourris in their entirety; each picture creates its own selection or potpourri. The cues are so stated as to give you both a prompt and direct cue. You are safe in making segue as soon as you are positive of your prompt cue. Avoid introductions to numbers unless otherwise stated. Avoid the shading of numbers as printed, an even mezzo forte being the best. From this you can get both pp and ff shadings with effect according to the demands of picture action. When shading is positively essential you will find words "Tone to action." Avoid the use of books. They are not practical for setting-up. In playing numbers following a certain line of action drop to pp in case there is a cut-in of flash scenes. For playing recopy plots legibly on large paper and fasten by clasp to right of music stand or piano. Read the Film Stories in this magazine as it will familiarize you with the cues. Studio projection would allow for material improvement in setups. We are always ready to hear from you and explain any difficulties you may have with these plots or otherwise. If personal reply is requested enclose stamped envelope.

THE EVIDENCE OF THE FILM

BY VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Thanhouser Release)

WHEN the parents of Mary and Bobby Schrader died only a few months apart, the question naturally arose as to what was to become of the children.

The mother and father had been quite poor and had a hard struggle to get along. When they died there was almost no money, and the United Charities Association took the case in hand.

The decision arrived at by the committee appointed to manage this particular "case," was that the best thing to do was to send the children to homes; Mary to one for girls and Bobby to one for boys. It was perfectly easy, and of course there could be no better way.

Unfortunately for the carrying out of the committee's plans, they had reckoned without Mary. She was only thirteen years old, but she saw clearly and she knew that the loving care she could give her little six-year-old brother, even in the worst of circumstances, would be better than all the food and shelter and clothes a Home could provide. It was very kind of the ladies and gentlemen, she told them, but she didn't want to go. She was thirteen and could work to support the boy and herself. At least she was going to try before she willingly parted from him.

Mary felt so strangely and spoke with such courage on the subject that the committee decided it was best not to force them but to wait and see what the result of the girl's plan would be.

She was assisted to find work, and was finally given a position in a motion picture factory at five dollars a week.

This seemed a great sum to Mary, and she was very happy. She rented a room near the factory for a dollar and a half a week, with the privilege of using the kitchen in the morning and evening. Bobby went to a nearby public school and came home at noon to get the lunch his sister left for him in their room. Her own lunch she took with her as she was not allowed to leave the factory.

It is having a real incentive that makes a person work hard, so Mary worked with all the energy she had in her young body and brain. Whenever her mind was free from her work she was planning how best she could use the three dollars and fifty cents left from her wages each week after paying her rent. She wanted to lay aside a little every week so that she would be able to buy clothes for herself and Bobby.

Mary worked so conscientiously and so well that when she had been with the company six months her wages were increased to six dollars. This was a great help and gave the girl courage.

"I can save a little more now and maybe some day I can send Bobby to the country."

Mary worked and Bobby went to school, and they managed very well in their one room. But there wasn't much money saved, for food and clothing do cost a lot even when you manage the very best you can.

When Mary had been with the company for two years she was put into the joining room. Her wages were raised to eight dollars this time, and her hopes were high.

The summer she was sixteen she had been with the film company for three years. Bobby was nine now, and was working during the vacation months for the first time in his short life. He was a messenger boy, and the three dollars he brought home each week helped very materially the family store.

It did not make Mary happy to see the boy working. She had wanted so very much to send him to the country that summer, but she couldn't manage it.

Each morning when they separated the sister gave the boy a kiss and a pat on the back and said, "Watch where you are going, Bobby, before you cross the streets." or "Don't forget your umbrella and rubbers," or "Keep in the shade as much as you can," according to the conditions.

Even though Bobby would have liked to go to the country, he was glad to be working, for young as he was he realized that his sister had a burden on her shoulders, and he was glad to lighten it a little.

One day a call came from a broker's office for a messenger boy. Bobby was sent. He knocked on the door of the private office of the man, and was handed a small package by one of his clerks.

He had some distance to go to the subway which would take him near the home of the lady to whom the package was to be delivered.

When he had gone about three blocks, whistling merrily and thinking busily, paying no attention to what was going on in the busy streets around him, a man suddenly came from a doorway and ran against the boy with such violence that he knocked him to the pavement, causing him to drop his package.

"Why, I beg your pardon, my little man," exclaimed the man in evident distress. He set the boy upon his feet and put the package into his hand, and with it a quarter.

As the man walked hastily along the street Bobby turned and looked hard at his back. Somehow it made him feel uncomfortable. He didn't know what his face looked like for he really hadn't seen it, the man had hurried away so fast.

The boy put the quarter into his pocket hesitatingly. He felt almost like throwing it away.

The lady to whom the package was addressed lived on a side street uptown. A maid answered Bobby's ring and took the boy into the lady's presence.

The lady was hot and uncomfortable. It never occurred to her that the child might be, too. "It's taken you a mighty long time, boy," she remarked, as she took the package. "But messenger boys are all as slow as the seven year's itch."

She drew out the contents of the big envelope. In a moment her face grew scarlet with rage. "What does this man mean?" she screamed. "He's sent me blank paper—nothing but blank paper. Annie," she said to the maid, "Call up Mr. Trimmer and tell him I want to speak to him at once."

"Mrs. Hunt, hadn't you better wait a little while?" ventured the maid.

"Wait until I've cooled down, I suppose you mean. No! I want to talk to him while I'm mad. That man is a crook. He's trying to swindle me by some trick."

The maid went to the telephone and called the number. Bobby felt that he would be happier outside, so he began to move toward the door.

"Stop!" cried the woman in a voice that froze the child to the spot.

"Here, Mrs. Hunt is Mr. Trimmer's office," said the maid.

Mrs. Hunt took the receiver.

"Hello, hello! I want to speak to Mr. Trimmer. Is that Mr. Trimmer? Well, Mr. Trimmer, you may be able to do other people, but you can't do me. What am I talking about? I'm talking about those blank papers you sent me. I don't know what kind of a trick it is, but it won't work on me. Yes, you'd better come up. The little papers are very nice. You'd like to see them. Oh, no doubt you sealed the package. Perhaps it became missealed and the bonds fell out and the blank papers jumped in. Witnesses? Well, you had better bring them and come at once or I'll have the police at your office in an hour.—Who—Oh, yes, I have him safe enough. Goodby, Mr. Trimmer."

Bobby was bewildered. He stood against the wall not knowing what to do. The lady paced the floor wiping the perspiration from her face.

In about three-quarters of an hour the broker arrived, bringing two young men with him.

"Well, what have you got to say for yourself? You better say it quick," said Mrs. Hunt, getting into another rage at the sight of Trimmer.

"Madam," said Mr. Trimmer, quietly, "you are insulting me. I have these two clerks of mine, Mr. Strong and Mr. Lawrence, who saw me put into the envelope and seal therein, the bonds which you asked me to send you to-day. Mr. Strong took the package from my hand and put it into the hand of that boy there. You received it from this gentleman didn't you, boy?" he asked, indicating Strong.

"Yes, sir," said Bobby wondering what it was all about.

"You see, Mrs. Hunt," he continued, "the package left me safely and was delivered to you in the condition of which you speak."

"You mean that the boy did that—put these blank papers in there?"

"Well, perhaps not just this boy. He may have friends, you know." Mr. Trimmer smiled a knowing smile.

Bobby's eyes grew bigger and bigger as the broker was talking. When he had finished the boy stepped in front of him and said, "Oh, no, sir, I didn't do anything like that. I came right up here on the subway train."

"How long did it take him, Mrs. Hunt?"

"He was an hour and a quarter from the time you 'phoned me he had left your office."

"Well," said Mr. Trimmer almost sweetly, "even allowing for delay of trains that is a good while. Are you very sure that you did not stop anywhere at all—not even on the street?"

"Yes, I stopped on the street 'cause I was knocked down by a man."

"Oh, you were knocked down by a man were you? That sounds interesting. Tell us about it."

"Well, he came out of a doorway, and ran into me and knocked me down. Then he picked me up again and gave me a quarter. I didn't want the quarter."

"Why not?" asked Mrs. Hunt.

"I don't know, but I didn't," answered Bobby.

"What did the man look like?"

"I don't know. He went away so quick I couldn't tell."

"That's very likely, indeed," cried Mrs. Hunt. "I was wise to keep you. Now my fine young man you can't go until I find out what's become of those bonds."

Bobby began to cry. "I didnt take them. I didn't, I didn't. Send for Mary, she'll tell you I don't take things that belong to other people."

Nobody paid much attention to the boy now. They were busy telephoning for the police. The little fellow could only sob and protest his innocence.

"Never mind, boy, you can tell the Judge about it tomorrow," said the policeman when he came. But Bobby only sobbed more.

He knew that Mary ought to know where he was, but he didn't know what to do about it. So when Mary went home at six o'clock that evening and Bobby wasn't there she went to the District Messenger office to enquire. They told her what they knew—that he had been sent to a certain office for a package and had not returned.

In an agony of suspense Mary telephoned to Mr. Trimmer's office and learned what had happened. As quickly as she could she went to the uptown police station where Bobby was. She begged to stay with him, but they said it was against the rules and they could not permit it.

The next day, in the Children's Court, the judge was kindly and did what he could. But the evidence was against the boy. It was better to hold him for a few days, it was thought, to see if more light could not be thrown on the case. If it could not, then, of course, the boy would have to go to a reform school.

Mary pleaded with Bobby's accusers and then with the judge. But they salved their conscience by saying they were doing the best thing for the boy.

There was nothing left for the girl but to go back to work, and she did so, very sorrowfully.

A few days later Mary was joining film as usual. She was watching her work very carefully for she didn't want to think too much. Her brain was worn out trying to find a solution to her problem.

Suddenly her attention was arrested by one of the tiny pictures. Surely that was Bobby swinging merrily along the street. She ran her eye quickly but carefully along the film. Then she sprang to her feet and rushed from the building without a word to anybody.

As quickly as possible she made her way to the police station.

"I have new evidence about my little brother—important evidence," she told the officer in charge breathlessly. "It is a film—a street scene and Bobby was taken without knowing it. And the man who knocked him down is there, too. The picture is so small I can't be sure who he is, but if you go with me to the factory you can make them throw the picture on the screen and then you can see. Oh, please come, please—please."

Mary was out of breath and trembling with excitement.

"Say, this looks interesting," said the officer to a detective who was near. "You and Jones go with the girl and see this picture."

When the situation was explained to the manager of the film company he was very glad to have the picture shown.

There was a tense silence in the little darkened room when the machine commenced to work.

"There!" cried Mary suddenly, grasping one of the detectives by the arm and pointing to the picture. "There! Do you see that man? Do you know who he is? It's that broker who accused my Bobby."

"Well, I'll be damned!" said Jones. "That fellow ought to sizzle in the hottest place that can be found for him. It's all right, little girl, you'll have your little brother home tonight."

Mary was silently weeping with joy.

When the detectives had gone the manager sent for Mary to come to his office.

"I hear you haven't anybody but your little brother, is this so?" he asked.

"Yes, sir."

"You must have had a pretty hard time to get along, haven't you?"

"Yes, sir, but I've managed."

"Tell me what you'd like most to do," he said.

"I've wanted for a long time to send my little brother to the country, but I haven't been able to yet."

"Well, what would you say to going with him?" asked the manager.

"Oh, I couldn't. I have to stay here and work for him."

"Suppose your place was here when you came back and your wages were paid while you were gone?"

"Oh, sir, that couldn't be."

"Yes, it could be. You and Bobby are to go to the country as soon as you wish and stay until you want to come back. I'll raise your salary to fifteen dollars and pay it all the time you're gone. I've inquired about your work since the detectives told me your story, and I am told you are an expert."

"Oh, how can I thank you, sir?" cried the girl.

"Don't try," answered the manager, "just run along as fast as you can go and make your little brother forget the last few days."

And Mary did.

THE PRESENT PROBLEM AND OPPORTUNITY OF THE MOVING PICTURE SHOW

By Louise Chadwick, Author America's Story for America's Children

THE moving picture show started unfortunately on a low basis. In some localities the pictures exhibited were worse than commonplace—they were indecent. This was particularly true in our large cities and in our colonial possessions—the Philippines—where the government was forced to most stringent measures, lest the influence of these pictures overbalance the effort being made to Americanize the school system—if the Philippines can be said to have had a school system—and to properly educate the children of the Islands.

In our own country we remember the vigorous stand that authorities were forced to take in order to suppress prize fight pictures, and the demand that decent people then made for a board of censors.

The moving picture has now passed up and out of that law environment; it has cleared itself somewhat of its unsavory reputation, but is still looked upon by many of the best people as something to be tolerated, perhaps, but not patronized. Thinking people are not yet sending their children freely to the moving picture show. The average well-meaning but careless parent, however, feels that the moving picture show is at least not indecent, and therefore the children of the masses frequent the moving picture show without let or hindrance.

The moving picture show must, however, rise still higher in the scale of influence; it must be more than tolerable; the pictures and the vaudeville that accompanies them must be better than merely mediocre and well enough. People are feeling this more and more deeply; and the psychological moment has arrived when the moving picture must pass up into another stage of development. Educators and clergymen and the best people are demanding it. Ordinarily, a good force perculates down through the strata of society, slowly winning its way, and at the very last influencing the lowest grades. The moving picture industry, however, seems to have worked reversely; it began as an entertainment of the very lowest, and is only now beginning to perculate upward—if one may make so unscientific an application of the term—to the higher grades of society.

To Thomas A. Edison we are in no small degree indebted for the awakening of the better people to a realization of what moving pictures might be made to do in the way of education. He has invented a special machine for school-room use, and is making as rapidly as possible appropriate films to accompany it. These films will in time, we note, cover the school-room course of study in history, geography, literature and the sciences. Already, there are quite enough films to furnish material for a beginning; and already an occasional show man—or as it happens, show woman—arranges his show with reference to these educational films.

In one Long Island town, I am told, a woman bought out a commonplace moving picture show, reorganized it, and has it now on such a basis that it ranks high with the best people and is liberally patronized by the teachers and supported by the ministers.

In Boston is a moving picture show, superintended wholly by a woman, the character of which is such that its good name has gone out into all the surrounding towns; and the hall is filled morning and afternoon almost wholly with suburban shoppers who have learned to love to drop in for an hour before going home. In this theatre the refined touch of an educated woman is evident in every detail. The ticket-taker is a quiet, refined girl—not the giggling, gum-chewing kind that one so often sees in such offices; the man at the ticket receiving box is most gentlemanly; the woman in charge of the coat room is a lady who might well grace a drawing-room; the ushers, all women, are courteous and thoughtful, and the show itself beyond possible criticism. There is no comedian, with his disgusting and stale bowery jokes; the illustrated song is not twanged out to a rag-time tune, accompanied by pictures so crudely colored that one wonders where, in these days of color-photography, such crudeness could have been found. And as to the pictures themselves, not one is presented that has not some strong lesson to teach. Not that the woman in charge ignores the funny; but she has the education and the keen perception to discern what is truly funny. Let me illustrate the character of this place concretely. During Holy Week the program ran something as follows:

First, the Pathé, Gaumont or Animated weekly, which is of inestimable value—a series of moving pictures illustrating current news. Following this, an illustrated lecture upon the Passion Play. The lecturer here is a man of trained and cultured voice, whose rendering is always satisfying to his hearers, free wholly from the shallow blatantcy that characterizes most salaried moving picture lecturers. The pictures, too, were fine; the same that I had seen the preceding winter, exhibited by Elmendorf, Burton Holmes and Newman. As the lecture closed the Orchestra began to play sweetly and softly the "Adoration." Slowly the curtain rose upon a dimly lighted stage, and there in black cap and gown stood a young woman, who sang simply, and in a deep, rich, contralto voice. As she finished the curtain fell, the orchestra played and the impression was not marred by any stage tricks on the part of the singer.

Following this came Selig's splendid rendering of the "Burial of the Maine." Following this an elocutionist rendered "My Old Gal" in a manner touching, tender and most artistic.

I do not recall, nor is it necessary that I should, the entire program; but this is sufficient to illustrate the character of this theatre, which so many best people patronize from day to day.

Now, it is my idea that in every community there might be a show of this high grade, and that it might be made to pay. In order to do this, the better part of the community should be thoroughly circularlized every week, especially the schools. Every prominent man and woman, minister, school principal, club president and city official should have special information through a mailed circular, announcing the coming week's program. In this way the theatre would be kept constantly before the public eye. It couldn't be forgotten; and even careless mothers would realize that there was in the town one safe place of amusement for their children.

It is often argued that a high grade show would draw fewer people, because there are fewer high grade people to draw from; that is too true. Still the question arises, do show men yet realize how many people of higher grade would like to attend moving picture places, but are ashamed or are afraid to? Isn't it possible that in any town of 50,000 there are enough higher grade people to fill a hall—and no theatre can accommodate more than its hall full.

Here is an illustration of the ready response of the better part of the people when a picture of value is advertised. A certain moving picture show advertised the "Tale of Two Cities," whereupon the teachers of the high school recommended their pupils to see it. Not only in this particular case was the book represented in film form valuable as literature, but it is one of the college requirements, and so of double interest to high school pupils and teachers. Accordingly almost the entire school of one thousand pupils attended the show. Certainly the exhibition of this educational film was financially profitable to the show man.

Certainly the dimes of the higher grade people are as good as those of the lower; moreover, one often hears people say that they would rather pay an extra nickel to see something worth while and be reasonably sure of not finding himself wedged in between uncleanly people—a feature of the moving picture show that militates no little against its patronage by decent people and will have some time to be reckoned with.

There is one feature which I have never yet seen touched even in the best of shows; and that is correllation of ideas. Always I leave a Movie with the feeling that however amusing it was scatterbrained. Now program-making, as any school teacher will agree, means getting together interesting numbers all bearing upon a central theme. It seems to me this feature might well be worth while in the arranging of a moving picture program.

I would suggest as an illustration of what I mean, the following Memorial Day program.

1. The Gaumont, Pathé or Animated Weekly—this is always suitable—should always open any program.
2. An illustrated lecture on the boyhood of Lincoln; slave life in the Old Dominion; or some similar popular subject which would be full of incident. Possibly a synopsis of Uncle Tom's Cabin. In these days of machines that throw up post cards, there is no limit to the subjects one may select for a lecture. The reflectoscope here has the advantage over the stereopticon, for in the latter available pictures are limited; postcards limitless.

3. Song—quartet—plantation melodies—final verse or chorus thrown upon screen and the audience invited to "join in." (Audiences love to sing!)
4. Moving picture.—I do not know what Civil War pictures there are, so am not able to give a definite title; there are many, though, several I recall but cannot give their titles. I remember one in which Lincoln himself was finely represented listening to the plea of a girl whose lover was unjustly court-martialed.
5. Elocution—Civil War poems.
6. Another moving picture (Civil War).
7. Civil War epigrams.
8. Another moving picture (Civil War).
9. Elocutional—"Picaninny"—selection.
10. Another moving picture (Civil War).
11. Violin—or 'cello—Star Spangled Banner.
12. Grand army men of the town—a flag salute—or exhibition of tattered flag, or song—Camping To-night—something implying tribute to these veterans.
13. Moving picture (Civil War or something patriotic).
14. Lincoln's speech at Gettysburg—by some one who can feel the speech and give it feelingly.
15. Or playlet—or a playlet—based upon selection from "The Perfect Tribute" in which is so beautifully told the story of how Lincoln wrote that speech, how terribly he felt because there was no applause—and how the dying prisoner showed him what a great thing he had done. This is a popular elocutionist's selection nowadays and could be easily dramatized.
16. Final—orchestra—quartet and audience—"My Country 'Tis of Thee."

End.

CHICAGO

"Theatre-blind and mad" would be about the proper title to give a certain class of Chicago citizens just now. The experience of some seems to be no guide for others, and we see one class "breaking their necks" to sell, rent or lease their theatres and the other class doing the same act to build new ones. In one newspaper this morning I noticed twenty-four moving picture and other theatres for sale or lease or for rent, and I know, upon proper authority, that at the present time there are just one hundred and ten new theatres being built in the city of Chicago. Is there anyone wise enough to predict the finale of this spurt of insanity? I hope this is not so in other cities, and most respectfully ask that the reader's opinion on the ultimate result of this spasm of activity in the latest amusement industry be written to The Moving Picture News, whatever may be his or her final deductions. Opinions will be thankfully received from any one interested, whether it be from manufacturing center or country town. Address either the home office in New York or O. J. Hazel, Suite 201, No. 9 S. LaSalle street, Chicago.

At the Queen Theatre, 2543 West North avenue, everything looked bright and cheery, and Manager H. E. Newell smilingly replied to my question about business. "Yes, we are enjoying as much of it as is usual during the holidays, and, maybe, a bit more. We go right on displaying the best goods available, and our patrons seem well pleased. Things will get back to their normal in a few days, and then I will be pleased to see you, both on business and show talk." This house seats about 500, and is quite popular with the families in the neighborhood.

I paid a visit last Tuesday to the Kleine-Cines Chicago headquarters, 166 North State street, and am glad that I did. I had the pleasure of meeting several home exhibitors and of making the acquaintance of the affable gentleman in charge, Mr. T. C. McCanahan, who kindly showed me through the exhibition hall or miniature theatre where the new release films are displayed every Tuesday afternoon at 1:30 to the exhibitors and invited guests. The room has a neat and cosy appearance, containing about a hundred chairs, a regular stage and curtain and a grand piano. I was a bit too late to enjoy the films, but was informed by one of the exhibitors that cigars were served to the gentlemen and candy to the ladies during the display of the pictures. Through his universal courtesy and kindness to every patron and caller Mr. McCanahan has built for himself and the house an army of friends and well-wishers. Mr. George Kleine, the proprietor of the optical company which bears his name, is also the direct importer of the films from the Cines factory, at Rome, Italy, and the equally great Eclipse films, manufactured in Paris, France, which are weekly shown on the screen in the little theatre referred to, as are also those of one of America's most famous film makers, the popular Biograph Company. I hope to be a regular Tuesday visitor to these picture displays, and the readers of the Moving Picture News shall be told of my personal estimation of the different films shown.

A happy incident occurred out of the fashionable South Side at the President Theatre last Wednesday evening. This popular theatre has heretofore been under the joint management of the Ascher Brothers, who are building the beautiful Panorama at Fifty-first street and Prairie avenue, which celebrates its opening on the evening of January 4. Mr. H. E. Ascher, who has been chosen business manager of the new house, was most agreeably surprised by being presented with a solid sterling silver cigarette case, gold lined, by the employes of the President, from his brother manager to the scene shifters—all participating in the gift. The case is handsomely carved and has his monogram engraved on the lid. An impromptu jollification immediately occurred, handshaking and good wishes being joyously exchanged. Harry, the recipient, was so enthused over the unexpected honor that he actually carried the gift around in his hand until someone called his attention to it, when he blushingly put it in his pocket. A round of applause followed the act.

Here's a good one, told at the La Salle Hotel, Chicago, the other day, to a lot of the exhibitors, including President M. A. Neff and myself, by that prince of good story tellers, the Hon. John J. Lentz, of Columbus, Ohio, who is also associate national counsel for the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League. I will name it "Negro Diplomacy":

"A Southern gentleman was sitting at the supper table in an Atlanta hotel, and had just finished eating. Turning in his chair, he met the dignified look of the negro head waiter. The Colonel asked, in his brusque, Southern way, 'Say, where is the nigger head waiter of this hostelry?'

"The coon threw out his chest, clasped his hands behind his back and said, impressively, 'Ah'm de collud gemman head waitah, sah, an' dem boys (pointing over to several black waiters at the end of the dining room) am de collud waitahs, suh.'

"'Ah! is that so!' said the Colonel. 'I want to see the "nigger" head waiter'; at the same time feeling in his vest pockets, and finally bringing forth a bill. 'I have been here several days and have not had the pleasure of tipping him, as I always do wherever I stop, so I thought I would give him about a fiver to sort o' square things between us, you see.'

"The negro hesitatingly held out his big, black mit and said:

"'Ah'm de niggah head waitah, suh.'

"'Oh, no, you ain't. You just said you were the "colored gentleman head waiter"!'

"The collud gemman, getting desperate, ejaculated, 'Yes, suh, Ah's de niggah head waiter, an' Ah kin prube it bah all dem niggahs ovah dah dat Ah am DE NIGGAH HEAD WAITAH, suh!'"

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

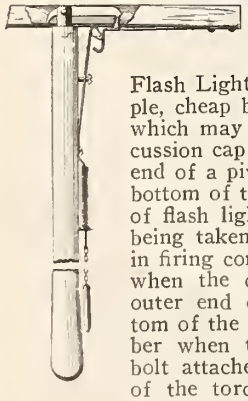
Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc.., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

In the Patent Office during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912, there were received 69,236 applications for "mechanical patents" (i. e. all applications for patents other than those for designs and reissues) 1,775 applications for patents for designs, 195 applications for reissues, 7,238 applications for registration of trade-marks, 941 applications for registration of labels, and 362 for registration of prints. Of these 35,539 patents were granted, including reissues and designs, and 4,635 trade-marks, 625 labels and 268 prints were registered.

The number of patents that expired was 19,634. The number of allowed applications which were by operation of law forfeited for non-payment of the final fees was 6,970. The total receipts of the office were $2,094,059.50. The total expenditures were $2,025,912.30, and the net surplus of receipts over expenditures was $68,147.20.

Thus the grand total of net surplus of receipts in the United States Treasury to credit of the Patent Office, over and above all expenditures, is now $7,132,072.96—a monumental evidence of congressional parsimonious indifference in view of the lack of room and facilities afforded, to say nothing of an inadequate force and poor compensation.

The fact that the Patent Office has earned the money, a portion of which might be appropriated for needed relief, and the fact that such requests by the commissioner and his predecessors have heretofore been ignored by Congress, has resulted in a disgraceful condition of affairs that reflects seriously on American spirit and enterprise. Considered as a business proposition alone, it would seem expedient to facilitate the operations of a money making institution if only to increase the profits. If any department of the Government should be "up to date" it would seem to be the Patent Office, dealing as it does, with inventions and innovations that are even ahead of the times. Present conditions are paradoxical, and would be ludicrous were they not so momentous. Positions in the Patent Office do not appeal to, nor would they be available for, the average politician or his clientele—there is "nothing in it" in so far as they are concerned—hence, presumably, congressional apathy.



Patent No. 1,047,243, issued to Frederick Klein, of Brooklyn, N. Y., is for certain improvements in Flash Light Apparatus, designed to afford a simple, cheap but effective device of the torch class, which may be conveniently manipulated. A percussion cap or the like is inserted under the inner end of a pivoted hammer, and between it and the bottom of the pan, after which a suitable quantity of flash light composition is spread therein, care being taken to have a portion of the compound in firing contact with the percussion cap to ignite when the cap is exploded. The hammer (the outer end of which protrudes through the bottom of the pan) is actuated by a flat spring member when the latter is released from a spring bolt attached to and operative upon the handle of the torch by means of chain and ring. A retractile coiled spring returns the parts to their normal positions. The inventor claims the combination with a pan and a supporting rod or handle therefor; of a hammer pivotally secured to said pan, the firing end of said hammer being inside said pan and the other end of said hammer extending below the bottom of the pan; a trigger slidably mounted upon said rod or handle; a spring member one end of which is secured to the bottom of said pan and the other end of which is provided with means adapted to engage the said trigger and be depressed thereby, said spring member being adapted when released by said trigger to spring upward and operate said hammer; and means adapted to automatically reset said mechanism after the same has been operated.

problem as to whether Fulgora, the Goddess of Lightning, inspired the innovation is not considered by a recent issue of Cosmos (Paris), but "Fulgor" is the designation of a metallized photo-projection-screen recently introduced, and apparently the effulgent brightness of the resulting image justifies the name. The factors of intensity of light and size of image having been developed as far as practicable under present conditions of science, the remaining factor of the reflective quality of screen surface has been investigated experimentally. The simple muslin curtain was superseded by the canvas coated with a white layer; then ground glass was tried, and finally the metallic screen. The reflecting medium of the "Fulgor" screen consists of aluminum powder, presenting a uniform silvery surface. The screen is flexible and may be rolled or mounted in the ordinary way. In an experiment demonstrating its superior reflectivity a tripartite screen was used—one section of ordinary muslin, one of canvas made opaque with white varnish, and the third of the aluminum metallized fabric. The official test made in the laboratory of the "Arts et Metiers," showed that "Fulgor" is 3.7 times as luminous as muslin, and 2.9 times as luminous as the opaque screen. The superior luminocity of the "Fulgor" arises from the fact that it absorbs little of, and reflects practically all of, the incident light; but like other screens of the type, it reflects chiefly in a direction at right angles to the surface, and not so well obliquely.

HE Patent Law Association, with headquarters at Washington, D. C., is fighting strenuously against the compulsory license and other objectionable clauses in a bill pending before the House of Representatives relating to Patents—said bill being antagonistic to the whole patent system in that it would not only make licenses compulsory after three years under certain conditions, but would materially restrict the remedy of the owner of a patent, limit the life of a patent to nineteen years from the date of filing of application therefor, and otherwise impair a system which is unquestionably the most important economic feature of our Government.

Anytone Limited, of Staverley, England, has applied for registration of the word "YTO" as a trade-mark for Photographic Papers, claiming use since May 3, 1912.

Extract from Edison's testimony before the House Committee on Patents: "I have heard and read numerous statements that many corporations buy valuable inventions to suppress them, but no one cites specific cases. I, myself, do not know of a single case. There may be cases where a firm or corporation has bought up an invention, introduced it, and afterwards bought up an improvement and ceased using the first patent—suppressed it, in fact. Why should that not be done? It is for the benefit of the public that it should get the latest improvement. I cannot see why the public should be asked to change the patent law to enable a competitor to get hold of the disused patent so that he could have a basis on which to enter into competition with the pioneer of the invention who has introduced an improved machine.

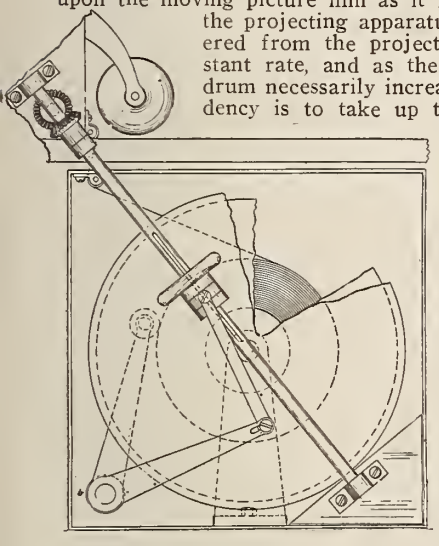
"Before any changes in the law are made, let the objectors cite instances where injustice has been worked on the public by the alleged suppression of patents for other reasons than those which were due to improvements."

"The mere ownership of patents does not constitute restraint of trade, nor on the other hand provide a cover for doing things forbidden by statute." U. S. Supreme Court re. Sanitary Mfg. Co. vs. United States.

Burch versus Goodson, 85 Kan. 86. Per contra "Then spare the rod and spoil the child."

Patent No. 1,047,528 to Charles Francis Jenkins, of Washington, D. C., relates to devices for avoiding serious tension upon the moving picture film as it is rewound after leaving the projecting apparatus. As the film is delivered from the projecting apparatus at a constant rate, and as the roll upon the receiving drum necessarily increases in diameter, the tendency is to take up the film more and more rapidly. Obviously this must be compensated for. A common expedient is to drive the winding drum by devices allowing slip of the parts whenever a low tension upon the film is exceeded. But as the roll increases this slip-causing tension acts through an increasing lever arm always equal to the radius of the growing roll, and hence the pull necessary to cause slipping at one stage of the winding is many times that required at another time, whence it follows that during a part of the winding period, it being impracticable to vary the force needed to produce slipping, there is undesirable tension upon the film. Film is at best short lived, and since tension upon it is principally exerted in pulling the film edges, at two perforations, against the faces of two narrow sprocket drum teeth, such tension as has been described seriously shortens the life of the expensive film while also causing unpleasant results in the pictures on the screen as soon as any wear or injury results. To obviate the difficulty the inventor drives the film winding drum by the frictional contact of a pinion bearing upon an external disk on the drum shaft, said driving pinion being controlled in position by a bearing roller contracting with the film wind and acting through a rock lever and connecting rod, as clearly indicated in the accompanying drawing. The claim is for the combination with a projecting machine and a film box alongside the same, of a film drum mounted in the box, a friction disk mounted on the drum shaft, a shaft in geared connection with said machine and provided with a drum-driving friction roller impinging on said disk and arranged to slide on the shaft without rotating thereon, and two rigidly connected pivoted arms, one normally pressing toward the periphery of the drum and the other connected by a link to said roller to slide the same on its shaft.



Extract from Brandeis' testimony before the House Committee on Patents:

"I am strenuously opposed to the Government fixing any price in any business that is competitive, but I do think that a man who has an individual article, whether it be covered by a patent, copyright, trade-mark, or trade name—something which is known as his article—would have the right to have that article distributed under the conditions which he deems best, including a fixed price, provided always that it is a competitive article; that is, that the field of competition is left open."

Washington's University's School of Medicine has installed an electrocardiograph. It is being used in the study and treatment of diseases.

The electrocardiograph is a thing of wires, copper plates, electrodes, cameras, lanterns, compensators, keys, accumulators and the other technical requisites of electricity. It is a moving picture machine, and one of the weirdest in the world. Miles from the bedside of a dying man one may watch the final fight of his heart against the coming of death. Infallibly the uncanny machine records the pulsations and contractions of the most tireless engine in the world, the human heart.

It is said that a marvelous reformation has been brought about in the motion picture theatres of Buffalo, N. Y., through the activities of the M. P. Exhibitors' League, of which John C. Harrison is president. The following from the Buffalo (N. Y.) Evening News tells the glad story:

"Buffalo is being given a better grade of motion pictures. No longer are the hundreds of patrons of the 'movies' revelling in the squalor of crime, unreasonable melodrama and morbid drama. To-day the hundreds of beautifully appointed theatres are veritable paradises of pleasure where leisure hours are spent to advantage by Buffalonians."

LUBIN

PETER'S PLEDGE, by Lawrence McCloskey (Jan. 14).—Peter Lang, a retired army veteran, receives a pension, just enough to enable him to live comfortably in a cozy flat and to keep a Chinese man servant. In his younger days Peter had been a wild one, but now, being paralyzed from his knees down, is confined to a chair built especially to accommodate his mountainous anatomy (Peter weighs over 300 pounds). To the arm of this chair is fastened his old cavalry sabre. His life is not dull, however, for almost every day he has as guests a half dozen old cronies, veterans like himself. At their rallies the bottle flows freely and their numerous toasts to the "old days" often go to their heads. Peter's cousin, Moriah Lang, is desirous of reforming Peter. So when she dies, rather than leave him her fortune of $20,000 to drink himself to death with, she aims to kill two birds with one stone by leaving the money to Sally Nelson, an old maid friend, with the proviso that she marry Peter and share the fortune with him, her idea being that married to a good woman Peter would forsake his evil ways and sober up. Peter consents to marry Sally, thinking that after he has connected with the $20,000 he can relegate her to household work. After their wedding the lawyers discover a later will providing that Peter must also sign the pledge against liquor, before the money is turned over. Peter is in a fix. He is married but refuses to sign the pledge. Sally forbids liquor to enter the house. Peter's old cronies try to smuggle it in, but Sally is too sharp for them. Peter finally succeeds in securing a bottle of good old rye. He has a week's thirst and goes at the whiskey accordingly. Sally's attempts to get the bottle away are met by Peter's flourishing sword and she is forced to retreat. When Peter recovers from bis souse he finds himself out on the fire escape where Sally, through the door, informs him he must stay until he signs the pledge. Peter sticks it out all night with crowds in the street watching the game, but in the cold, gray dawn it begins to rain and Peter signs the pledge.

THE WINNING HAND, by W. Hanson Durham (Jan. 14).—The young sheriff is out after the outlaw, Manuel Mandazo. The sheriff stops a moment to see his sweetheart, Beth. Hardly has he left when the outlaw appears at the cabin and advances admiringly toward the girl, but is repulsed at the point of a revolver and in the struggle which follows the revolver is discharged. The sheriff hears the shot and rides back and is struck down senseless by Manuel. After disarming the senseless sheriff the Mexican is about to stab him, when Beth snatches up her revolver and drives the Mexican from the cabin. He swears vengeance upon the sheriff and his sweetheart.

The sheriff regains his senses and, weak and wounded, takes the trail after Manuel. He comes upon him in the deserted powder shack of an old mine. He is surprised and overcome by the Mexican and left bound. A stub of candle is left burning on an open can of blasting powder.

The Mexican returns to the girl's cabin and forces his way in. Meanwhile the sheriff has struggled to his feet and, realizing Beth's danger, he lifts the burning candle from the powder can with his teeth and burns through the bonds which hold his wrists and rides back to his sweetheart's house. Just as the Mexican has broken in the door, the sheriff bursts through a window, covers him with his gun, while the girl snaps a pair of handcuffs upon his wrists.

AMERICAN

THE MASTERPIECE (Jan. 13).—Absorbed in his painting, Robert Gainsworthy neglects his beautiful wife—not intentionally—but rather in the preoccupied way of a man who did not want the single train of thought broken. He worked for days in his studio without ever speaking to her, and the strain told on their relations for the wife brooded bitterly.

Jack Sanders, a globe-trotting cousin of Robert, visited at the Gainsworthy home. He took many strolls with the heart-sick wife and found himself madly infatuated. Sunken deeper and deeper into the fervor of his work, the artist did not see. One day, while rising in his studio, he surveyed the picture and found the face wanting. Looking from the window he saw his wife and the cousin idly strolling arm in arm. He conceived a plan. He would accuse her of unfaithfulness, study quickly the horrified expression on her face and paint that expression into the woman of his canvas. He did so and worked many hours feverishly.

Stung to the quick, the innocent wife fell easy prey to the machination of the scheming cousin. The latter proposed that she write a note of farewell and fly with him temporarily until the husband should come to himself. She fell into the trap easily.

Arising from his canvas, the artist knew that his fame was made. He thought of his wife for the first time, and started to go to her and tell her of his success, apologize for the pain that he might have caused her, and share with her the pleasure of his masterpiece. He found the note, the world opened before his feet, the pleasure of success turned to bitterness.

And then the cousin proved unworthy to his trust and the artist reclaimed his wife, both happy in a new and better understanding.

THANHOUSER

THE TINIEST OF STARS (Jan. 14).—When a member of a theatrical orchestra went "on the road," he left behind him in the big city his wife, their little boy and their baby girl. For some weeks he sent them money regularly, then all word from him ceased. The wife, on inquiry, learned that the company had disbanded in a Western city, and the members of it were presumably making their way East the best they could. The woman was sickly and practically unable to work, but her little son proved to be an energetic bread winner, secured free board by aiding his mother to do the work of a janitor, and at odd times sold newspapers. He always had his eye out for a chance to make money, and one day determined that little sister was in a position to help them. A local theatre advertised "Amateur Night" with a cash prize for the winner, and the boy saw no reason why the little girl should not bring the money home to mother. She was little, and cute and could recite, therefore, why should any one doubt her success.

"Amateur Night" was a night of triumph for the little girl and the brother who believed in her. The other contestants were outclassed, while the audience rapturously greeted the baby girl who smiled at them so sweetly and lisped out a few words with a confident air. Even the members of the orchestra, ordinarily the most stolid of individuals, enjoyed her performance. One in particular, the first violin, was deeply affected. It was his first night at the theatre, and he was overcome with emotion when he recognized in the tiniest of stars his little girl whom he had so vainly sought. There was a joyous reunion in the wings of the theatre, and a proud little girl went home to tell her mother that "I got papa and some shiny money for being a good girl." It is needless to say that with the father's return the troubles of the family ceased, and the little girl was never again called upon to be a leading lady on an amateur night.

EDISON

THE TITLE CURE, by George A. Imlach (Jan. 17).—Mr. Clayworth, a wealthy American and self-made man, has a daughter Bessie, who is determined to marry a foreign title much against her father's wishes. She has an American suitor, William Brooks, who is deeply in love with her, but he is given little encouragement.

Mr. Clayworth plans to discourage his daughter with nobility and accordingly goes to an employment agency, where he engages three foreign menials to impersonate nobilemen, supplying them with evening clothes and arranging to have them call at his house that evening. Bessie is overjoyed when she learns from father that three noblemen are to honor them with their presence. Father incidentally suggests that if the noblemen do not come up to her expectations to patch up her little quarrel with Billy and say no more about marrying a title.

The fun begins when the three bogus noblemen present themselves at Clayworth's house as Duke Macaroni, Lord Brien Berue and Baron Hasenpfeffer. They are ushered into the drawing-room and introduced one after another to the ambitious Bessie, who vainly attempts to entertain them. At first she is puzzled, then she becomes discouraged and finally thoroughly disgusted.

Father fairly revels in his daughter's discomfiture as she dismisses one after another. The antics of the foreign trio can hardly be described; suffice to say they arouse irresistible laughter. After her experience with supposed nobility she meets her American suitor and welcomes him with open arms.

Bessie turns father's joke into a boomerang when she jokingly sends him a message stating she has eloped with Duke Macaroni. Father takes this message seriously and nearly goes insane at the thought of losing his daughter through his foolishness. When Bessie returns home on the arm of Mr. Macaroni to ask forgiveness, her father's rage knows no bounds, and just as he is about to throw the bogus Macaroni out, off comes his wig and moustache, revealing the welcome features of Billy Brooks, Bessie's American suitor. This gives father the surprise of his life, and his joy is unbounded, for his daughter is title cured.

101 BISON

A GAMBLER'S LAST TRICK (Jan. 25).—The gambler, an out and out bad man, is sick of it all—the "luck," the weeping Claire, the sickly baby. He leaves all to fate and goes.

A miner in the Far West strikes it rich, much to the delight of his daughters Moll and Nell, and the sheriff, who is affianced to Moll.

The gambler happens along. He offers to buy a half share in the new rich mine but is turned down. He determines to get a share by fair or foul means. He makes love to Nell, who is much attracted to him. He persuades her to go along with him, and sends a note to the father saying that if he does not receive word that he is a half partner in an hour's time he will take care the miner never sees his daughter again. The message is brought by a Mexican. The miner and Moll are distracted and call upon the sheriff's services. They find a disspirited and desperate woman with him. It is Claire, who has tracked the gambler.

The sheriff draws on the Mexican and forces him to exchange suits. The men take the Mexican with them and surprise the gambler, who is about to kill Nell after a desperate struggle. The sheriff is about to arrest the gambler, when Claire shoots and kills him.

NESTOR

HIS BROTHER'S KEEPER (Jan. 24).—Donald goes to the city to get employment, and his widowed mother grieves silently. He is all she has. Donald obtains employment and forms one or two bad acquaintances.

Tom is released from prison. He is not a bad man, but the woman got him in her meshes and he stole to supply her with the money and jewels she demanded. Tom goes to her, feeling sure of her help. She turns upon him and Tom squares his shoulders and sets his face toward the hills and freedom.

Tom happens upon the widow's farm and asks for work. The widow's motherly heart warms toward him, and, for the first time in many years, Tom knows what a good woman's influence means. He cannot deceive her. He tells her what he has been and would go, but she detains him, for she sees all the latent good in him.

Donald goes ahead rapidly and earns good money. He meets the woman and is quickly in trouble. Her demands reduce him to desperation. He thinks she is a beautiful woman, and intends to marry her. He, therefore, sends a photograph of her to his mother, and asks her to let him have a good sum of money.

By chance, Tom sees the photo and he reads the letter. He determines to save the widow's boy. Instead of posting the letter containing the money, he places it in the old family Bible and goes to the city. The widow thinks he has gone with her money and is sorrowful and hurt.

Tom goes to the woman and threatens her. He hides as Donald enters her room, and fearful of Tom, she tells the boy who and what she has been. He is disillusioned and heartbroken, and Tom follows and takes him home to the widow.

Satisfied that he has made amends, he starts to go out of their lives, but mother and son persuade him that he is necessary to them, and he stays and is content.

CHAMPION

THE DEATH TRAIL (Jan. 20).—The scene takes place in the Canadian Northwest. The company, through its factor, objects to free traders in general and to Fairfax in particular. Fairfax is fearless, and he defies the company, and continues to operate his free trading store. His wife, Marie, is alarmed and would have him go, but Fairfax stands his ground.

Ungan, an Indian, owes the company money, and, when he applied for more goods, he is refused. He goes to the Fairfax store and states his case, and Fairfax is willing to trade with him. The company's assistant watches them, and he in turn is watched by Marie. The assistant sends an Indian for the factor and some men and they arrive as Ungan is leaving the store. The factor again orders Fairfax to cease trading their guns, and, giving them each a knife, sends Fairfax and Ungan down the long trail without food or drink. He orders them shot if they return.

The faithful Marie returns stealthily to the store and ties a supply of privisions in a shawl. She also secures a rifle and hits the trail after the two men.

Fairfax and Ungan wander on until their strength gives out. They sink to the ground, and while in an almost comatose condition, they hear a squirrel cracking a nut. Fairfax throws his knife and kills the squirrel, and Ungan and he struggle for its possession—the Indian's savage nature claiming all of it. Fairfax weakens first, and, as the Indian is about to knife him, Marie appears and calls, and the tragedy is averted. Ungan craves forgiveness and, with the food at hand, they have enough to travel to the next trading station.

URBAN-ECLIPSE—GEO. KLEINE

TWO MEN AND A GIRL (Jan. 15).—Ralph and Gerald, two young fellows, are desperately in love with a charming actress, and when she accepts Gerald's invitation to dine with him at his rooms, Ralph is extremely jealous and vows revenge.

On the appointed evening of the dinner, a curious series of events takes place. The actress sends her regrets, but about the time she should have appeared, the young lady living in the flat above returns from a visit and, mistaking Gerald's door for her own, in the darkness, enters his room, to the great embarrassment of both Gerald and herself.

Meanwhile Ralph, who has been watching in concealment, hastens to fasten the outside doors, making the pair prisoners. It is some time before they can free themselves and Gerald hastens to chastise Ralph for his treachery, but as it turns out, the whole thing was not so terrible after all, for the young people have become well acquainted through the mishap and proceed to fall in love with each other.

CINES—GEO. KLEINE

A FISHERMAIDEN'S HEART (Jan. 14).—Stella is the acknowledged beauty of a little fisher village near the sea. She appears impervious to the calls of love and laughs her way through life, careless of the lovemaking of the young swains. Harry, besides being more persistent than the others, enlists the sympathy of her father, but she will not listen to either of them and ridicules her fisher-lover's protestations of affection.

One day, however, on her way home from the shore she meets two young fellows, who become rude and even attempt to kiss her. Her cries bring Harry to the scene, who quickly disposes of the assailants. Stella now begins to look upon him with favor, but he, remembering her previous attitude, determines to put her to the test. He pretends to make violent love to another girl, with such good effect that Stella soon becomes madly jealous and makes unmistakable her passionate love for him. Explanations follow, and the final scene ends in the betrothal of the lovers.

KINEMACOLOR

WAR AND PEACE (By Bennet Misson).—Hugh Deming, a young Northerner, visiting in the South in the early sixties, meets Sidney Carey, of Virginia, and is invited to the latter's home.

Hugh becomes enamoured of Alecia Carey, Sidney's sister, and she accepts his attentions.

A ball is given at the Carey mansion and in the midst of the merrymaking a young man enters with news that war has been declared.

Four years later, Hugh has returned South as captain in the Federal army. A spy is reported within the lines. Hugh is placed in command of a detachment to search for the spy. The search leads to the house of the Careys', where the spy is supposed to be hidden.

Hugh gives orders to men to enter house—the Carey family protest—the spy is discovered in an old wardrobe—Hugh gives orders to shoot—Alecia opens door of wardrobe. Spy discovered, proves to be Sidney. He is arrested, taken out and ordered to be shot.

As the sergeant starts to bandage his eyes, a declaration of peace is proclaimed—Sidney rushes home—general rejoicing.

After the war the Careys receive Hugh warmly—Alecia is cold—Hugh disconsolate—the father of Alecia tells her "No man is worthy who does not do his duty"—Alecia's love for Hugh is too strong to withstand the pleadings of her dear ones and finally succapitulates.

GAUMONT

THE DUNGEON OF DESPAIR (Jan. 14).—Brevort takes his young bride to his castle in the country which has been unoccupied since the time of the Revolution. There is a legend that parts of the building built in the time of Louis XIII were built over dungeons and that in the French Revolution persons mysteriously disappeared. The young wife, in a spirit of fun, goes to hide in a huge chest standing in a hallway near her room. She steps into it. Its bottom being movable, she falls into the dungeon far below. There is a wild search for her in the morning and the young husband, with anxiety distraught, goes to Paris to engage the aid of a detective. David Daniels, sleuth, returns with Brevort and makes search for the missing wife. The old chest interests him. He steps into it and, like Mme. Brevort, plunges through the bottom into the dungeon. Here he finds the girl, who is nearly starved. Around her are the skeletons of the unfortunates who here perished. The detective is resourceful, and, taking his revolver, fires upward through the chest. Brevort hears the report and lowers a ladder to the captives, who climb to safety.

A REGRETTED RESIGNATION (Jan. 23). Mr. Heeza Boob, with his employer, is as popular as the smallpox. His employment as a clerk doesn't afford excitement, and one evening, in excess of enthusiasm, he goes forth upon a liquid skate. While in this condition he writes a letter to his employer, which reads: "Bossiest of Bosses: Consider yourself fired from the job of being my employer. Heeza Boob." After reaching home he realized that he had forgotten that he had a large wife and a small family on his hands (and on his bank account). His wife is not at all pleased that he had resigned his perfectly good job, and she felt like arguing with him with a broom or a rolling-pin, only she reflected that she was a perfect lady. "We must recover that letter before your 'fired' boss gets it," she exclaims. Accordingly, Mr. and Mrs. Heeza Boob and all the little Boobs go round to the mail-box to wait for the postman to come to collect the letter. By hook or by crook they hope to induce him to return it. They try many cajoleries. They offer him a little loose change, in fact, excruciatingly loose, but he says, "You can't bribe me—besides, fifty cents is no inducement." They tell him what a handsome brute he is, how he has a shape like Mary Garden, how he looks like Venus at the Sink, how he has a face that would give a cannibal an appetite. He couldn't be jollied. "Have a heart," pleads Heeza Boob. "If you don't give me back that letter my wife will have to take in washing."

Little Osucha Boob has a toy gun and the Boobs arrange a diabolical scheme to bring about the fall of the adamant postman. They sic little Osucha Boob onto the postman, and have him push the gun in between the legs of the man of letters as on he walks with the pride of a head waiter. The gun does its fell work and the postman sprawls in the dust of the road. "Did you enjoy your trip?" asks Heeza Boob as with great suavity he pounces upon him and tries to take the letter from him by main force. The postman, however, fights him off and continues on his way, somewhat broken in spirit (also in shins).

A happy thought enters Heeza Boob's head (from the northeast). They noticed that the postman's shoes have been much trod upon. Heeza Boob runs into a shoe store and emerges with a beautiful pair of brogans. He dangles them in front of the postman's nose. The latter's heart is in his feet, and he couldn't be moved except through the raptures of a new pair of number thirteens, double D. He gives back the letter and all the little Boobs and all the big Boobs wallow in their joy. Heeza Boob hands the youngest Boob the letter which would have cost him his job. The younger Boob holds the letter in his cutiecute hands, and he is so Truly A Boob in name as in action that he thinks the letter is to be mailed. As he passes a post-box, he drops into it the letter.

The Boob family forget about the matter, and next day Heeza Boob reports to the office. "What happened?" is his agonized thought as he tumbles down the stairs under the impetus and encouragement of a pointed toe. Of course, the boss received the letter and from thence the source of his "kick."

CRYSTAL

PEARL'S ADMIRERS (Jan. 26).—Pearl is admired by Chester, whom she likes, and by Bill and Angelo, both of whom she tolerates. The rivals fight among themselves whenever they meet, but make little headway with Pearl. Bill meets Pearl's father and gives him a cigar. The old gent tells Bill that Pearl is expecting him at the house. Angelo also meets the old gent, and treating him well, is told the same thing as Bill. Bill arrives at Pearl's house, and is only there a few minutes when Angelo arrives. Meanwhile, Chester has met Pearl's father, and giving him a box of cigars, is told that Pearl is waiting at the house for him. He also arrives at Pearl's house, and the other two admirers, jealous of Pearl's attentions to him, leave. Pearl then decides to have some fun with Bill and Angelo. She writes both of them a letter asking them to meet her at the same time. Angelo loses his letter. He arrives at the appointment place only to find Bill there. Surprised, he asks Bill what he is doing there, and Bill shows him his letter. Angelo accuses him of stealing his, and a fight results. Pearl and Chester, who were there to see the fun, run for a policeman, and the two rivals are dragged off to jail, leaving Chester in full possession of Pearl.

On the same reel:

THE FALSE ALARM.—Belmont is always late at the office. He buys an alarm clock, but it breaks down on him, and he is late again. His employer threatens to discharge him if he is late again. He hits upon a scheme, and arranges with Barnett, his fellow clerk, that when Barnett passes his house, he will pull a rope that Belmont has tied to his foot, and hanging out the window. The next morning at about 5 a. m. the milkman on his rounds sees the rope, and gives it a very healthy tug. Belmont awakens with a start, and thinking it Barnett, and time to go to work, dresses hurriedly. The milkman continues pulling on the rope, and Belmont, untying it from his toe, the milkman falls into the cellar. Belmont rushes to the office and is surprised to find the janitor there sweeping. The janitor points to the clock, and Belmont, realizing his mistake, sinks into a chair, half asleep, and awaits the arrival of Barnett and the boss.

GEM

THE SCAPEGOAT (Jan. 21).—A young cadet in a military college, in company with two other young roysterers, are expelled from school for an aggravated infraction of the rules. He fears the wrath of his father, who is a parent of the stern type. He, therefore, cooks up a scheme which he thinks will be excuse enough to satisfy fatherly criticism. He buys a pair of smoked glasses telling his father that he had to leave school because much study had ruined his eyes.

This does not go with the old man at all, so poor Glen is ordered out of the house. He states his intention of joining the army. The old man falls asleep and dreams that his boy has enlisted, gone out to the Philippines, and there been shot after a court martial, for striking a superior officer.

In the meantime, the boy has met his old school companions, and they proceed to celebrate their release from the halls of learning. In this interesting operation they are aided by three beautiful ladies from the halls of Thespis.

Suddenly awakening from his terrible dream, the old man rushes frantically to a nearby recruiting office in vain search of his boy, whom he had so cruelly used. He comes back, unsuccessful and heartbroken. The boy finally comes home, feeling very happy, only to find a couple of very miserable parents. They are overjoyed at his safe return.

RAGS AND RICHES (Jan. 23).—Richard Harvey, the superintendent at the works, has a close friend in Frank Hart, the foreman. Their children are engaged to each other, and the fathers anticipate the marriage with pleasure.

One day Harvey is ordered to place the men upon half time. This enrages them and a fracas ensues, and Hart, hoping to save his old friend from injury, pushes him away from an angry workman. Harvey falls to the ground and is severely injured, and when convalescent his nature is changed, and from a kindly, genial man he becomes a confirmed misanthrope, and upon his return to the works, acts like a tyrant, and his unreasonable methods cause the men to complain to the owner and he is discharged. He blames this upon his old friend, and forbids the marriage between the young people, and when his daughter refuses to break the engagement, he disowns her and moves to a distant city. The young couple marry. Years pass. Harvey is now a miserable miser and lives in a cellar. He has amassed a considerable sum of money through his penury, and is despised and dreaded by all as a grim and forbidding recluse.

The young couple have a little girl. Circumstances compel them to move to the city, and they rent a flat next door to the old miser's cellar. One day the little girl rolls her hoop down his cellar, and when she goes there after it, is brutally repulsed by the old man. She notes the mouldy crust that serves for his meal, and goes to her home and piles a plate full of fruit and good food and brings it to him. They soon become great friends, and he never dreams that she is his granddaughter. One day he misses her. She is very ill. The case baffles the doctor, and he insists upon calling a distinguished specialist whose fee is very high—far above the means of the young couple. In affright, the wife leaves the dying child with the doctor and runs to tell her husband of the new development. She dreads the worst, for they have no money.

The old miser creeps from his dingy cellar into the sunlight, and asks the landlady where his little friend has gone. She tells him of the sickness, and he decides to visit her. The doctor tells him of the desperate need for the high-priced specialist, and the old miser decides to use his hoarded money to obtain the services of the famous doctor. He hastens to the depths of his rag-filled cellar, but his good impulse oozes away, and he dreads to think of parting with his gold. At length his better nature prevails, and he gives the money to the doctor, and bids him hurry back with the specialist.

THE SYMPHONY (Jan. 23).—Herman is a kind-hearted, artistic man. He means well, but he forgets to be businesslike and practical in the pursuance of his dreams of artistic triumph, for Herman is a musician and a composer.

Things go steadily down hill and finally there is no food and Herman's wife is very ill. The child is hungry and Herman plays his own symphony to soothe her. He goes to seek immediate work, taking his violin along with him.

Whilst crossing a road he is knocked down by an auto, and suffering from concussion, he is taken to the hospital, where he lies unconscious for weeks. Upon his recovery he hastens home with a sinking heart to find his wife has died, and Miriam, his child, has been taken by a lady to her home. Herman goes to the house indicated, only to find the occupants have sold out and gone to Europe.

Many years pass. Herman opens a small musical studio. His daughter Miriam has blossomed into a beautiful young woman. She inherited her father's love for music and friends suggest Herman to her foster parents, and she calls and takes lessons from him. She also meets Arthur, one of Herman's favorite pupils, and the three become the greatest of friends. The attraction between Herman and Miriam is naturally mutual.

Miriam catches cold and Herman goes to the house of the people who adopted her. He asks her to show him her new piano and she sits and plays the first few bars of a tune. Herman recognizes his own symphony. He finishes it, to her surprise. She shows Herman a picture of her "real" mother and he knows who this girl is. He longs to disclose himself but feels it is better not to do so, as he can offer so little and she has so much.

They are interrupted by Coverly, who is paying persistent court to Miriam, much against her desires. Herman has occasion to find out Coverly's true character and determines to assert his parentage. He is invited to a musicale at Miriam's house and during the evening he overhears Coverly forcing his attentions in the adjoining room. He claims his daughter and dismisses the dissolute young man. Explanations follow and the field is left open for Miriam and Arthur.

VICTOR

"SUNNY" SMITH (Jan. 24).—Jack Jones and Albert Brown were chums, but rivals for the hand of their boarding house-keeper's daughter. Jack, though, was the favorite of the mother as well as of the boarders. Jack could sing and he and Mary, the daughter, would sing and play to the delight of the boarders, while Albert would wander off in disgust. Many times was Albert forced out of the conversation by his rival, and he decided to get even.

He was going along the street when he saw two seedy-looking pieces of humanity, and it was then that a thought struck him to get even. Taking one bum by the arm, he took him to his room, dressed him up in his clothes, and introduced him as his friend, a count from Paris. His piece of revenge, and another when the boarding house-keeper told Jack to give up his place to the count.

Not being used to such a nice table and a maid, "Happy," as he was called, proceeded to make love to the maid but was called down by Albert, and soon turned his attentions to Mary. As soon as the meal was over, he ordered a touring car and took them all out riding. This, of course, was Albert's money, and he, not daring to refuse, had to go along. Next he took them all to dinner, and it was Albert's money again. So he went on spending money lavishly.

Albert, in the meantime, was getting tired of his bargain but the landlady and her daughter had already begun to like the "count" for himself alone. Finally, when he used all of Albert's money, it was time for Albert himself to say something. Coming into the room where the count was talking to the housekeeper and her daughter, he started to tell them who the count really was, but they would not hear of it. He already had become engaged to Mary and was the pride of the whole boarding-house. Jack and Albert were sick at heart and went to their room to "Die in Despair," for Sunny had beat them at their own game.

POWERS

ON BURNING SANDS (Jan. 24).—Nell Carter is loved by two men, a rancher named "Smiling Joe," and Bill Stover, a cowboy. Bill Stover falls from grace, and is caught red-handed horse-stealing. After a terrific struggle with the sheriff, Bill disarms him and escapes, but he refuses to go away. The sheriff approaches "Smiling Joe" and asks for his assistance in capturing Bill.

Nell and Joe's sister, Nancy, hear of this and beg him not to have anything to do with the matter, but Joe only laughs at their fears and the incident causes an interruption in the friendship of Joe and Nell.

Joe goes with sheriff, and stealing upon Bill, they overpower him, and be is sentenced to a term of imprisonment.

The months pass by. Jos and Nell have made up their differences and are married. Bill is released from jail and hears of the marriage. Smarting with resentment, he determines to go after Joe and kill him on sight.

A Mexican, who has overheard Bill's declaration, seeks out his sister Nancy, and she goes and tells Nell. Joe determines not to be caught unawares, and decides if there is to be any killing that he will get in the first shot if possible.

The two men stalk each other, and finally come where two streets meet. The men know of the presence of each other, and Bill sees Joe's gun pointing around the corner and draws back. The two women, both anxious for Joe's safety, have followed the movements of the men, and at the critical moment Nell seizes Joe's arm and begs him not to shoot, whilst Nancy seizes Bill and entreats him not to be revengeful, or to add another crime to his conscience. They bring the two men together, and Joe, anxious to please his wife, holds out his hand to Bill, who refuses to shake and goes away.

Joe has to attend a round-up. Bill, seizing his chance, forges a note which he gives to a Mexican to take to Nell. In it he tells her that as she seems to think more of Bill Stover than she does of him, that she had better hang on to him, that he is through with her and has gone away. The Mexican tells Bill the effect that the note has on Nell and he follows it up. She shows Bill the note and asks his advice. He makes violent love to her and tells her to come with him. She consents and leaves a letter for her husband, telling him that he will never see her again and that she has gone back to God's country with Bill Stover.

Mad with jealousy and anger, the broken-hearted Joe determines to follow them and to get Nell back and to kill Bill. He gets on their track, which leads to the desert. Bill and Nell are caught in a terrible sand-storm. The water peters out, and all the brutal instinct arising in the man, he drains the canteen dry, and throwing her aside, he turns his steps backwards. Joe comes upon her in this predicament, and after finding out the true cause of her plight, he gives her water, resuscitating her, and they start back for home. On the way they come across the dying Bill, who begs for water, but Joe merely kicks him and tells him to die like a dog that he is. They leave him and, arriving at the edge of the desert, Joe sends Nell on alone. She has begged him not to let this man's death mar their lives, so he goes back to try and bring Bill out to safety.

Nell gets help, water and provisions and hurries back in time to save them both. Bill is thoroughly cured, and as he passes out of their existence he tells Joe that he is the better man of the two.

FRONTIER

THE SURVEYOR AND THE PONY EXPRESS (Jan. 22).—In the days of the pony express, even in its latter days, the West, particularly the small settlements, was compelled to put up with what is termed the really bad men, the men who lived upon ill-gotten game. Many of them were really courageous and when brought to bay would fight to the death like a rat in a corner. Their crimes were many, from the robbing of the honest gold-seeker to the holding up of stage coaches, and even the pony express, and our story deals in part with a brave pony express rider, whose duty it was to carry the mail from one small village to the railroad stations, sometimes a hundred or more miles away.

The pony express really means a relay of horses at certain distances apart, so that the rider, when his horse is fagged out by a rapid journey, can be left at a certain point and another horse taken from that point, and the relief on the second horse comes at the point where the third horse is stationed, and so on until his journey is finished.

In the early 70's, in a small Western village on a beautiful mid-summer morning, "Buck" Conners, the pony express rider, rides into the little village of Buckskin, Arizona, and up to the post-office. The postmaster is waiting for him. He brings out the mail pouch and explains to the express rider that he must be very careful of the mail that day as it contained a large sum of money.

Two bad men who have been sufficiently close to overhear part of the conversation, decide to hold up, if possible, the pony express at a certain point along the route, where there would be very little danger for themselves. They rush out of view, get their horses, and ride rapidly away along the route that the pony express rider must follow. In the meantime two government surveyors who had very recently been sent by the government to survey a tract of land very close to Buckskin, prepare to set up their transit to begin their day's work, and we see them spying through the transit at the rough hills in the background.

They see a rider come into view, his horse being urged at a very rapid pace. They next see two riders coming at an angle much closer to them than the first rider. They dismount, rush to the bridle path, and as the single rider comes into view, their guns flash and the rider drops to the ground. They see the two men rush to the fallen man, and notice that a struggle is taking place between one of the hold-up men and the faithful dog of the pony express rider.

The surveyors leave their work and rush toward the spot where the struggle is going on. They arrive too late to prevent the robbery, or intercept the robbers, who rush away and are quickly lost sight of in the underbrush. One of the surveyors, Ralph Goodman, decides to get to the settlement as soon as possible and notify the sheriff. This is done. The scene shifts to the sheriff's office. Ralph rides up, informs the sheriff, who mounts his horse, and together with Ralph they speed back to the spot where the robbery occurred. The robbers, finding the sheriff close upon their track, decide to make for the railroad station, discard their horses, and get out of the county.

Rose Williams, the belle of the little settlement, and as brave a little woman as the West has ever produced, realizing something unusual has happened, and fearing for her sweetheart, Ralph Goodman, decides to follow on their trail with a woman's curiosity to find out what has happened. She arrives at the spot where the brave pony express rider is lying, and assists her sweetheart in caring for him.

Jim Rogers, the friend and co-worker of Ralph, has been hot upon the trail of the robbers, and is close upon them when they dismount and rush to the railroad station. They see him coming, again mount their horses, and are away, followed by Ralph, whose courage is to be commended even if his judgment is bad, for the robbers ambush him, and they leave him tied hand and foot, and rush away to escape the sheriff, whom they have a wholesome fear of, and they realize that he is now close upon their trail. The sheriff comes into view, and seeing the robbers, dashes away upon their trail. The chase ends in the arrest of the robbers, the securing of the stolen loot, and the scene now shifts to a happy reunion.

Ralph feels that he is deserving of a reward, and puts a motion before his sweetheart, Rose. She immediately seconds same, and the echo of wedding bells can almost be heard. The pony express rider regains his health, and is ready and willing to undergo any hardship to remain with his chosen profession, the pluckiest pony express rider in the state, and so

THE COMING OF SUNBEAM (Jan. 22).—Proud old Major Neal disowned his only child, a beautiful, wilful girl, because he considers her marriage a mesalliance. One morning (Christmas), a hamper is found beneath the major's covered driveway. The butler and housekeeper (in the secret) carry the hamper to the library and present it to Neal. He is greatly puzzled, and finding a card attached inscribed "To Major Neal," he opens the hamper, only to slam it hastily shut with a startled and angry expression.

The hamper contains a baby girl. The old man orders the child taken from his presence, and advertises for the one who presumed to leave it to take it off. But no one claims the child, whose sweetness and innocent joys soon begin to move the old fellow's heart. The baby constantly makes advances, in spite of rebuffs, until the old man succumbs and worsbips the child, calling her "Little Sunbeam." Sunbeam is stricken with fever. Now is the motber's chance. She comes (the old family doctor aiding and abetting her), disguised as a nurse, and with a mother's untiring love and care, nurses Sunbeam back from the shadowy brink. Old Major Neal and his disowned daughter meet at the bedside of the child, and through their great and mutual love for Sunbeam, become forever reconciled.

THE ROADS THAT LEAD HOME (Jan. 24).—Mrs. Hurley is a wealthy old lady who is rather proud of ber antecedents. Her son, a young, clean-cut, college-bred man, like other gilded youths, makes the acquaintance of an actress and the inevitable follows. He marrier her, much against the commands of bis mother. As a consequence, his mother cuts him off and he is forced to make his own way. He is successful, and the glamour of having an actress as a wife soon wears off. He neglects her for the companionship of a rather smart and fast set in society. The pace they set is rather strong, and after weeks of gambling and dissipation, he finds himself separated from his wife and position.

His wife, now burdened with a child, is forced to seek employment. Fate guides her to the house of her husband's mother, whom she doesn't know. Here she is employed as a housekeeper and the lonely old lady makes a favorite of the child. The story is full of pathos, and the original way in which the whole family is brought together adds to the dramatic force of the production.

PUNCH

FINNEY'S LUCK (Jan. 16).—Finney's luck turns from good to bad luck again so fast that he can't keep track of it. His wife wants to go to the theatre on the very evening that Finney is playing so close to the cloth that he can't buy tickets. Thoroughly discouraged, be is walking along the street when a crook bumps into him and drops two theatre tickets at his very feet. He picks them up and runs home to bid bis wife prepare for the glorious evening, while the woman from whom the tickets were stolen is putting the whole Burns Detective Agency on the track of the thief.

Finney and his wife are enjoying the performances and Finney is standing ace high in his wife's regard when the detectives succeed in tracing the number of the seats for which the stolen tickets call. Luck changes again when Mr. Finney and his good wife find themselves lodged in a cell with excellent chances of spending the night there. But luck changes once more and Finney comes into his own.

On the same reel:

SAW WOOD.—Hawley, a famous author, takes the road as a tramp to get local color for his new book. He leaves a letter for his wife, acquainting her of the fact. A reporter learns of Hawley's scheme hy questioning Mrs. Hawley and puhlished a picture of Hawley and the story in the newspaper. A real tramp takes the same road as Hawley and gets into trouble by helping himself to a pie that is cooling on the window-sill of a farmhouse. The farmer mistakes Hawley for the offending tramp and sets him to work on the woodpile while he keeps watch over him with a gun.

Meanwhile the real tramp makes good his escape and is mistaken by the good folks of the town for Hawley, the noted author. Weary Willie is dined and w'ned and treated like a king. Even Hawley's wife joins in the festivities to do him honor, and when Hawley returns after having spent a long hard day making little sticks out of big ones, he is taken for a genuine hobo and his troubles are numerous until he is recognized by his wife and friends.

MAJESTIC

JUST HARD LUCK (Jan. 12).—Convicted of a crime which he did not commit, Arthur Finley serves a long term in prison. He is released and starts out in life with the terrible handicap of being an ex-convict. It seems almost impossible for him to get employment, and he is about to give up in despair when he meets the detective who helped to fasten the crime upon him for which he was wrongfully convicted. He makes a firm friend of the detective, who lends him money and uses his influence to get him a new start. He secures a good position and wins the love of the beautiful daughter of his employer.

Life is at last worth living and the fates seem to smile upon him when a crime is committed at his very door. His past record as a convict places him under suspicion and circumstantial evidence points to his guilt. But his detective friend believes in his innocence and bends every energy toward proving him guiltless. Through various methods used by scientific detectives, including thumb prints, the real offender is apprehended and the hard luck that has followed Arthur Finley changes to good fortune and prosperity.

CHILD LABOR (Jan. 14).—John Morgan is a rich factory owner, with one child, Grace, five years old. He adores this little one and her word is law to him.

At the factory Morgan decides his payroll is too big, so after talking the matter over with his foreman, he gives out the edict that all his men are to be laid off. And next day a big sign is pasted on the factory gates, stating that little girls are wanted to make artificial flowers. Many children apply and the little daughters of the old workmen are forced to do their fathers' work in the big factory. James Martin, a good, kind father, tries to get other employment, but finds it useless. When he thinks of taking his little ones away from school his heart is almost broken. But finally they, too, have to join the little army at the factory gates.

One day Grace visits the factory and Billy, the office boy, takes her through the works. She sees the sufferings of the little ones and realizes the truth. She helps a little girl with her tasks and bathes the forehead of a fainting child. Her father comes in and sees this and is very angry. He sends her home. The next week he received a large order and compels the children to work overtime in order to get it out on time.

While the little ones are slaving for their bare existence, Grace, surrounded by every luxury, falls ill. And in delirium she sees always before her the wasted faces of the little toilers in her father's factory. She pleads with him to get them free, and finally her little voice has the desired effect. To please her he sends word to the foreman that the children are to be dismissed and the old hands taken back. There was great joy throughout the factory that day. The children go to see Grace when she gets better.

James Martin sees h's children start back to school and he returns to his old p'ace in the factory joyfully. And later Morgan opens a kindergarten for the younger ones and Grace is its litt'e patron.

GREAT NORTHERN

THE TEST (Jan. 18).—This is a unique comedy that is sure to make an appeal because of the originality of its plot, as well as the many humorous situations which are depicted. Laughter is its prime object and this has been attained in unmistakable fashion. Alexander Groot is a wealthy retired merchant who has made a will leaving his fortune to his son, Cecil, who is an army officer. After meeting Lizzie Ford, a college chum of his daughter, Emily, Mr. Groot writes a condicil in which he provides that his son must marry Miss Ford in order to inherit the fortune. The merchant is convinced that the young woman will make a desirable wife for his son, although the latter has never met her.

When Miss Ford arrives at the Groot home, Cecil is absent, and in a spirit of fun she suggests to his sister that she act as her maid. When the young officer arrives he is at once smitten by the charms of the supposed maid and proceeds to make love to her. His advances are not taken seriously by the young woman, hut Cecil is convinced that his heart has been won by the young woman who has been engaged to act as his sister's maid. He confides in the latter, but she reminds h'm of the codicil of his father's will and advises him to cool h's ardor.

Much to the consternation of the young officer, the maid decides to quit her post and carry the deception still farther. Lizzie Ford has fallen in love with Cecil Groot, but she figures that she must still test the character of the man she loves. During the absence of Cecil, and with the connivance of his sister, Miss Ford leaves the house and makes a railway journey to a neighboring town. Here she dons the choicest of her wardrobe, and with a landeau and a pair of spirited horses, makes the return journey to the Groot home.

Cecil is returning from a horseback ride when the young woman arrives and on the verandah of his father's home he is introduced to his fiancee, Miss Ford. Imagine his surprise and joy upon being brought face to face with the fact that the maid and Miss Ford are one and the same. All's well that ends well.

RELIANCE

A NIGHT OF TERROR (Jan. 11).—Robert Drew, a young commuter, finding he will be forced to stay in town overnight, persuades his wife to get her girl friend whom he bas never seen, to stay the night with her. However, when the time arrives, he discovers he is able to catch the last train for home, and rather than leave the two girls alone, he decides to go back. The girls, who have gone to bed, hear the noise below and think a burglar has broken in. They are scared to death.

Robert fixes some supper in the kitchen, and bearing the dog bark, he goes out to get him. The girls in the meantime, find a revolver and slowly go downstairs. Finding the dishes, they are positive that someone has broken in, and retreat upstairs in terror. Robert comes in with the dog, and finding the tools which the girls have overturned in their fright, he also becomes convinced that there is a thief in the house. He starts upstairs in search of the supposed burglar.

His wife has forced her friend to don one of her husband's suits to scare off the thief, and Robert, coming upstairs, sees a man as he supposes, leaving his wife's room. He rushes up but the girl locks the door. He bangs in vain. They refuse to open it until, finally, his wife recognizes his voice. He rushes in to discover the truth—so terminates their night of terror.

THE WHEEL OF FATE (Jan. 15).—Dick, a telephone operator, is in love with Margie, another operator. Joe, who is also in love with the girl, has been refused time and time again. Being naturally of a jealous disposition, he hates Dick with all his heart and waits for the time to come when he can do him some injury. Margerie, operator at a small station, leaves Dick there on duty one night. There is a large sum of money in the safe and she bids him to be careful. Joe, who has followed, sees a chance to injure Dick. He steals in and knocks the other man out and opens the safe, making off with the money. Dick recovers, and grabbing his gun, he follows. Joe crosses a railroad trestle.

When Dick attempts to follow, he falls weakly in the middle of the trestle. He can go no further. The great express is speeding toward him a mile a minute. He drops through the trestle and clings there. The train passes over him and he drops into the water below. He is found there unconscious a few hours later by the men who have come to search for the thief. They decide he stole the money and was running away with it. He is arrested and placed in prison to await his trial.

Margie believes firmly in Dick's innocence. She finds a coat button at the scene of the crime and notes that a button of the same kind is missing from Joe's coat. She lures him to the station, after arranging with detectives who have installed a dictagraph in the station. Margie allows Joe to make love to her and gets him to brag of the theft. She reaches the door to tell the detectives, but he sees her intention and threatens her. She manages to send a distress call and the detectives arrive in time to arrest Joe. Dick is freed and told he owes his release to the girl who loved him enough to make a brave fight for his freedom.

ECLAIR

THE GALLOP OF DEATH (Jan. 21).—Aside from all moral concepts, divorcement has its own inherent evils and future sorrows. It is of those sorrows that the plot of this drama is woven. Though divorce may terminate the legal phases of the marriage tie, yet it rarely ever stifles the emotions of the heart and memory of both concerned.

The story opens with the arrival of the moneymoon couple in America. The wedding trip of Mr. and Mrs. Bryan had been a tour around the world, and while in India Mrs. Bryan had become very much attached to a trained tiger which her husband purchased for her, at the same time arranging for the services of a Hindoo trainer and caretaker.

They opened up their home in a suburb near New York City, and were as happy as could be. Just like the lovers they still were, the couple would take long rides each day out along the cliffs of the Hudson.

Then the ghost of divorce appeared. It came in the guise of a letter from Mrs. Bryan's first husband, whom she had separated from in England. He had learned of her second marriage, which was in violation of her agreement not to marry again. He had come to America and had sent her a request to meet him.

To guard against any exposure of her past —particularly to Bryan—she consents to meet the man at a place designated by him. He implores her to leave Bryan and return to England with him and when she refuses he threatens her. In his growing anger, he attempts to use force and she strikes him with her riding crop and gallops off.

The man, a cad at heart, determines upon a scheme of revenge.

Fearing exposure, she persuades Bryan to offer their home for sale. He consents and this becomes a means whereby the divorced husband gains entrance to their home. He comes on the pretext of being a buyer, and times his call when only the servants are in. While being shown through the bathroom, he secretly pours some vitriol into a basin of toilet water. He thanks the caretaker and leaves, gloating over the success of his devilish plan of revenge upon the woman.

Returning from her ride, she goes to bathe her tired face and dust-filled eyes in the basin of water usually prepared for her. She screams out in pain and the servants rush in. The Hindoo caretaker also follows. He finds a handkerchief on the floor and the peculiar odor arouses his suspicions.

He takes it at once to the tiger, who has been trained to follow a scent, releases the beast and they make for the trail of the guilty man. They tree him and at the point of a gun, the Hindoo forces the wretch to the suburban station house.

The woman, in the meantime, believes she has been blinded for life, and rather than that Bryan shall know her past, she decided to take her horse and dash over the Hudson cliffs to death in the waters below.

She compels her groom to saddle her horse for her and place her on its back. Then she starts on her "gallop to death." But, no, not death, for Bryan returns unusually early that day. He hears of his wife's plan and follows until the almost fatal moment later.

Savagely she whipped and spurred her steed on. They seemed to go with the very wind as they bounded the rocks and wound in and out among the woodland trees. And behind her rode Bryan, who never raised his whip nor touched his spur, but he begged his horse to go faster, faster, faster, and the beast understood. And now he comes in sight of her, grabs her from the saddle and rears both horses up and away from the edge of the precipice.

Death had ridden hard and fast—but life was faster.

And but a few weeks later the threatening veil was raised from her eyes and sight returned once more—and happiness, too.

Southern Hotel, Columbus, Ohio, where the League was organized and where the Ohio State Convention will be held Jan. 21-22, 1913.

THE SPECTRE BRIDEGROOM (Jan. 23). —A free adaptation of Washington Irving's amusing tale has put the locale in the United States at the close of the Revolutionary War.

We begin with a Hallow Eve party at Baron Von Landshort's where the young people are peeling apples—throw a long peeling over their shoulders, and the initials of the thrower's sweetheart—Hilda's peeling forms V. A., and her father, the Baron, tells how his daughter was betrothed when a little tot with the son of his old friend, Van Altenberg. Naturally Hilda would like to know her betrothed, and at the suggestion of one of the girls consults a witch, who tells her, "When midnight tolls look in the old mirror and you will see the picture of a young Hessian officer, and highly pleased, she hugs the mirror to her heart. In the meantime young Van Altenberg, disbanded Hessian officer, on his way to meet his fiancee of his infant days, Hilda Von Landshort, meets a brother officer, Herman, at the inn. Journeying together they are attacked by "Skinners." Van Altenberg is mortally wounded, dying, he begs his comrade to announce his death to Hilda.

The Baron Von Landshort and family, including Hilda, are impatiently awaiting the arrival of the young fiance (whom they've never seen since childhood) to attend the betrothal feast. Herman arrives to impart the sad news, is mistaken for Von Altenberg, and is not permitted to explain but is seated at the side of Hilda, as the long expected fiance. As the feast progresses he finds Hilda very sweet, and falls desperately in love with her, and then dares not disclose his real identity. The fact that the guests are so impressed with the baron's ghost story, gives him an idea of how he can withdraw discreetly, so he tells the baron he is awaited at the cathedral—must leave, saying "I am a dead man." After he leaves, the guests, horror-stricken, think him a spectre. Poor Hilda is heart-broken, etc. A few days later Hilda fails to appear at morning prayers—her aunt goes to call her and finds that the bird has flown—carried away by the spectre her relatives think—and a letter to the baron announcing Van Altenberg's death two days ago. The baron is then sure he has entertained a spectre, and if his daughter has married him, "My goodness my grandchildren will be spectres." Obsessed with this idea he even has visions of the spectres dancing around him. In the meantime the eloping couple have come to their senses and Herman leaves his wife to be chaperoned by a witch until he can smooth matters. The baron and his sisters are still bewailing the loss of Hilda—when the servant announces the return of the elopers. "What, the spectre coming here?" "No," replies the servant, "a flesh and blood man." Hilda craves forgiveness—her husband not being a spectre is forgiven, especially as the old baron feels assured that his grandchildren will not be spectres.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

The Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union, No. 1, of New York, held their last regular meeting on Monday, January 6, 1913, and there was a grand attendance. All the boys were anxious to receive the new 1913 union cards, and dues came in very lively. It can be said that this young organization stands now as one of the largest of its kind in the country, and beyond a doubt it is the largest in the State of New York, the membership numbering more than 500. Twelve new members were obligated at the last meeting, making the total of new members since December 23, 1912, 27 and 15 new applicants. If this should continue, and there is no doubt that it will, the organization will very shortly number above six hundred.

Continuing with chat of last issue on what was accomplished during the year of 1912, an account was given of the grand work of Brother James Daisie, and now a few words must be said of brother Robert Levy, the treasurer of the M. P. M. O. U., No. 1 The brother is employed at the office of the Eclair Film Company on West Forty-second street, and is in charge of the projection department. He has done much in the line of elevating projection, and that is something to be proud of, as all of the exhibitors are aware of the fact that when they need an operator and want good projection, they call up local No. 1, knowing that members of this organization are all that is claimed regarding their work. Brother Sam Kaplan was vice-president of the ex-auxiliary of Local No. 35, and when the auxiliary decided to have a local of their own, now known as Local No. 1, Brother Sam Kaplan was very active and worked very hard to keep the boys together, and he has made many new members. The brother is employed in the factory of the Precision Machine Company, manufacturers of the Simplex machines, and many jobs are given to the boys through Brother Sam Kaplan. He is now giving his efforts for the success of the grand hall given by the members of No. 1 to be held on February 10, 1913.

John Rickards, the secretary of the hall committee, is working day and night getting everything in readiness for the great event. He is well used to this work as he was chairman of the last year hall committee.

NOTICE

To all moving picture operators that seek to join the Moving Picture Operators' Union, No. 1, of New York, you have another chance. Until February 15, 1913, you can join this organization with a five dollar ($5.00) entrance fee. After date mentioned the entrance fee will be increased to twenty-five dollars ($25.00). Get busy and apply for membership at the office of the union, 133 Third avenue, near Fourteenth street.

RALPH KNASTER,
Business Representative.

MEETING NOTICE

The next regular meeting of the M. P. M. O. U., No. 1, of New York, will be held on Monday, January 20, 1913, at Teutonic Hall, 66 Essex street, New York, at 12 o'clock midnight.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT FILM MERITS

Lubin

"John Arthur's Trust" is exceedingly fine, and has a right bright touch of comedy even in its most serious moments, for it is, withal, a drama and a good one. Arthur Johnson, as John Arthur, lawyer, typifies the man of honor, and eventually marries the heroine of the story.

* * * *

Lux

"Don't Tease the Dogs" and "The Matrimonial Fever" are two comedies on the same reel, the former too foolish to be even funny. The latter, however, is some improvement on the former, showing some very acceptable scenes, and making some pretense at true comedy.

* * * *

Imp

"The Bearer of Burdens," from Imp, with King Baggott in the lead, is especially good. It is the story of a tragedy in the life of a policeman. The opening scenes of the picture tell of how a policeman tried to care for a sick wife and still keeps on his job. He falls asleep when on duty and is discharged. The remainder of the story deals with his efforts to find work and his eventual reinstatement to the police force.

* * * *

Keystone

"Saving Mabel's Dad" and "A Double Wedding" is another case of bad and good on one reel. The former is much too foolish and farcical to be entertaining. The latter, however, has some comedy underlying the situations.

* * * *

Majestic

"The Little Enchantress" is one of the most commendable films on the market. The story is simple and beautiful in sentiment. This film can be used without compunction in schools, churches, or in fact, in any moving picture program.

* * * *

Vitagraph

"A Bit of Blue Ribbon," from the Vitagraph Western Company, is very good indeed, though not at all out of the ordinary as a Western drama. Some very fine scenes occur during the run of the story.

* * * *

Biograph

"The Telephone and the Lady," from Biograph, is not up to the mark as a production. It is too melodramatic, and does not do Biograph justice as a production.

"Three Friends," from the same studio is, on the other hand, a film of the first water, and in quality runs a close second to "The God Within," which we so highly commended in our last issue.

* * * *

Pathe

"The Bear Trap" is an example of what can be accomplished with a simple story by the exercise of an artistic imagination. A big black bear plays an important part in the development of the story, but one of the most striking scenes is that where is thrown upon the screen a picture which consists at first only of a fringe of bushes and a still gray background, which is a puzzle when it first comes upon one's vision. The still gray background, however, proves to be water, for soon from the extreme top of the picture a canoe comes gliding silently over its surface. This picture is splendidly produced.

* * * *

Kalem

"A Treacherous Shot," even though it has in its makeup the everlasting duel, is a very acceptable drama. It is a story of colonial days, and very charming in its presentation.

* * * *

Solax

"A Million Dollars" reflects great credit on the Solax studios. The point of the story is really a suggestion of what might happen at the present day should an equal distribution of wealth be made. It is a fine lesson, and also suggests that we find happiness in our work.

* * * *

American

"Another Man's Wife" is rather a surprise from the "Flying A." In this film we see the old favorites, Jessica Van Trump, Pauline Bush, Kerrigan and Richardson, in a new atmosphere. Here they have changed from the simple country girls and cowpuncher chaps to well-groomed people.

STATE RIGHTS

THE BEASTS OF THE JUNGLE

THREE REELS

Full of thrill and sensation—photographically perfect—tinted and toned. Scenes laid in the aromatic atmosphere of India and the treasure-laden hills of the Transvaal. Settings and costume authentic in every detail and secured at enormous cost.

$18,000

worth of animals and scenery were used in the production. Actors appear in scenes with a lion, tiger, elephant, parrot and monkey. As far as it is known this is the first picture in which as many different animals have been used in a single production and in which the performers appear in the scenes with the wild beasts.

A Good Big Clock
For Very Little Money

EVERY EXHIBITOR Should have a GOOD clock next to the screen. Should subscribe for a GOOD trade paper.

The Moving Picture News

Having made a favorable arrangement with one of the largest clock companies in this country, can now offer to its readers a Regular Eight Day Clock, 38½ inches high, with a 12-inch dial, and a subscription to the Moving Picture News for one year for $4.45.

This clock is first-class in every respect and would cost you a great deal more than the price we charge you for both the clock and subscription combined.

The offer is good for old or new subscribers, and is offered for a limited period to show you how you can get two GOOD articles for a small outlay, and you need both.

REMIT BY CHEQUE OR POST OFFICE MONEY ORDER

NOTE:—As three of these clocks can be forwarded by freight at the same cost as one only (the three weighing under 100 lbs.), it will pay you to send in three subscriptions for one delivery to the same freight office at $4.45 each and divide the freight cost.

Each clock is packed in a wooden case, f.o.b. at the factory, Forestville, Conn., weight 30 lbs. Have your local agent advise you just what the freight charges will be.

"GET TOGETHER"—THEIR MOTTO

The issuance at an early date by the GAUMONT COMPANY of a weekly eight-page newspaper, to replace the GAUMONT GRAPHIC in its present semi-monthly form, is another effort by GAUMONT to put his shoulder to the exhibitor's wheel.

This newspaper will contain photographs from releases of the week and synopsis of each. These photographs with their accompanying text can to advantage be hung in the lobbies of theatres, as can also the printed list of the subjects on the GAUMONT WEEKLY. Set in bold display type the latter will be productive of that interest which leads people to the cashier's window.

This publication is free to exchange men and exhibitors, and will be sent, the GAUMONT CO. announce, on application to Flushing, New York City.

EDUCATION, SCENARIOS, ET AL

THE daily papers issued recently have been criticising many of the films on the market to-day, and not very favorably towards the manufacturer. There is much to be said on both sides. All plays that deal with the sex problem in their nauseating details should be banned. The time has come when the whole industry must take an advance step, and start housecleaning on these lines. In all the reports that I have received from the censorship boards throughout the country not a single word has been spoken against the Edison films, and I have wondered why. A thorough examination of these films teaches one a strong lesson; that is, that Managing Director Plimpton has been very careful to keep out of the scenes anything that hurts the feelings of the audiences. I wish the remainder of the Patents Co. would take a lesson therefrom; it would accrue to and reflect very much to their advantage. Some of the Independents are terrible offenders in this respect, and are bringing odium upon their own heads, as well as the industry as a whole. I do not know fully where the fault is, but it seems as though there is a lack of good subjects from the scenario writers, and I wonder if that is the fault of the "schools," "institutes," and such like ilk, for the mediocre results that have been noticed for the last few months.

It seems to me to be a great pity that papers like the American Theosophist, The Saturday Evening Post, Harper's Monthly, The Editor, The Literary Digest, Scientific American, and other high-class magazines should allow their columns to be open for the advertisements of the "schools," which are only easy methods of taking money from a gullible public. In the columns "For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays" William Lord Wright oftentimes speaks with good force against these so-called $30, $20, $15 and $10 courses of instruction. Recently a letter came in to me from which I make the following extracts:

"A few months ago the writer bit at one of those tempting institute ad baits which you have been flaying with such unflagging zeal. At the time your stinging remarks (naturally) nettled a sensitive soul, and a strong temptation (more than once) was entertained to challenge you to a duel, figuratively speaking, but—to be brief, you won, and are still the victor.

"The so-called 'institute' is nothing more or less than a kindergarten for 'would be's' and 'who will never get theirs.'"

It was very gratifying to receive the above estimate of my stand on this question, and I feel sure that if proper attention was called to the high-class magazines, and, if they would make inquiries into the character of the so-called "schools," much benefit would accrue to those who cannot afford to spend money in this manner, but who are anxious to learn. The writer goes on to say:

"If you wish to preserve your identity—for some—you will allow nothing under heaven or earth (your responsibilities cease at that, for the things liable to happen under the earth) to disturb the page 'For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays.' It is one of the features of your magazine. Please continue to let it be so, ad infinitum."

I can assure my correspondent that as long as it is possible to continue to do good work that this column, and such remarks, will always be found in the pages of the News. There is a great need for good scenarios, which are very few and far between. I was in the editorial rooms of a film company the other day and saw some two or three hundred scripts that had been received that morning, and three people were busy looking through them; out of the whole bulk only seven or eight were selected for consideration. Another result of the school and institute work. There are so many "everyday" incidents that can be worked into scenarios, providing the people have got the brains (and will leave out anything of a murder, shooting, or duel incident) to select the various items, and have the education to write upon them, then there is no doubt in my mind they will have their scenarios accepted by the manufacturers, who are looking for good dramatic and educational points.

THANHOUSER PLANT BURNED TO THE GROUND

It is a most regrettable fact that the Thanhouser Moving Picture Company, at New Rochelle, suffered extreme loss through fire on Monday, January 13th, when the manufacturing plant of the company was burned to the ground.

The plant, which was a frame structure on Crescent avenue between Warren and Grove streets, burned so rapidly that there was little chance for saving anything. The loss is estimated at a large figure.

None of the actors or actresses employed by the film company were in the building at the time of the fire. Six or eight of them, including Miss Marguerite Snow, the leading woman, and James Cruze, the leading man, were at dinner at their hotels when the alarm was sounded. Mr. Hite said that he would at once begin the erection of a new plant at New Rochelle He promised employment in one or another of his companies for all of the actors and actresses until the new plant was completed.

The Thanhouser producing company in the Middle West, under Mr. Heffron, was to be back at New Rochelle this week, but they have been wired to go right on to Los Angeles to the Thanhouser Company's studio at that point, where a company under Mr. Henderson has been working for a month past. This will make two companies at work there turning out the regular "three-a-week." As all the negatives were saved, they will not even miss one single release, as already advertised.

Mr. Lawrence Marston, the producer of the "Star of Bethlehem" and other Thanhouser features, is busy furnishing a studio at New Rochelle and is even now at work on a picture right on the ruins of the fire, entitled "A Thanhouser Heroine." To have their factory and offices completely destroyed and still be able to make their regular schedule of releases without a single interruption is surely à remarkable part of their unfortunate fire. With the two companies at Los Angeles and Mr. Marston already at work in New Rochelle, they could soon make four releases weekly instead of their three-a-week.

The Thanhouser Company is equipping a temporary studio and factory in New Rochelle and will decide within the next few days in regard to a permanent new factory, studios and offices, which will undoubtedly be located in New Rochelle. For the present, they should be addressed at the Cooley Building, New Rochelle, where offices were equipped within a few hours after the fire. There was no insurance on the building or any of its contents.

GREAT NORTHERN SPECIAL FEATURE

The Great Northern Special Feature Film Company is priding itself upon its latest release, "In a Den of Lions, or Life in a Circus," which is said to be one of the most realistic dramas so far presented and dealing with the thrills of the sawdust arena. In this film almost the entire equipment of a circus are brought into action The story is shown in the form of a drama and is said to be filled with many exciting incidents as well as heart interest. The lion tamer is in love with a high wire walker who is the wife of a gymnast employed in the same circus. The attentions of the lion tamer are repulsed and he becomes enraged. During the action of the photo-drama, a giant python escapes and finds its way into the dressing-room of Ulla, a young wire walker. The little child of the latter is asleep on a couch and is saved from the embrace of the serpent by the timely arrival of the mother. Then there is a den of trained lions, over which the wire walker is obliged to take a perilous journey. She falls, but is rescued by her brother. In the end the lion tamer shoots himself accidentally while trying to keep his beasts in subjection. In the interim there are gymnastic stunts in midair and the husband of the wire walker plunges through the net. The photography is said to be excellent and the production up to the Great Northern standard.

"I have read Mr. Wright's book. Value it highly.

"If you have any other premium, kindly send it with my renewal. Am writing scenarios and find the News a great help, and could not get along without it.

"Sincerely yours,

"_____."

A COUPLE OF EXCELLENT ECLAIR RELEASES

"The Gallop of Death" is one of Eclair's best. The story is one of treachery on the part of the former husband of Mrs. Bryan, the heroine, who pours vitriol into the basin where she is about to wash her face and thereby blinds her. The gallop of death referred to is a ride which she takes while still blind, on her favorite horse, and is rescued by her lover just at the edge of a high cliff. A tiger also figures largely in the story, which is altogether very interesting.

One of the finest of recent Eclair releases is the two-reel subject, "The Spectre Bridegroom" for January 23d, which was reviewed by us in our last issue. This film has the atmosphere necessary to successful presentation of a Hallowe'en story such as this is. It has with it plenty of the dainty freshness of youth, and a charm that will carry it in any theatre or other place of entertainment.

THE EDISON KINETOPHONE

Talking Motion Pictures

On another page of this issue we publish the initial announcement of Thomas A. Edison's latest invention, the Kinetophone. It is a combination of Mr. Edison's two inventions—the Kinetoscope and the phonograph—a machine which produces the first genuine talking-pictures ever offered the public.

Mr. Edison recently gave a press demonstration to an audience composed of the representatives of the press. So enthusiastic were the newspaper men that large space and numerous editorials were devoted to the subject.

Mr. W. E. Waddell, who was formerly the manager of the Kinetophone department with the Edison Company, recently formed a corporation, the American Talking Picture Company of New York, to act as sole distributors of the talking pictures. Mr. Waddell invited a number of representative amusement men to a subsequent demonstration of the Kinetophone. As a result of this demonstration, the largest contracts in the history of the theatrical profession were immediately signed between the American Talking Picture Company and the following gentlemen:

M. Shea, of Buffalo and Toronto.
Carl Lothrop, of Detroit and Rochester.
Harry Watkins, of Montreal.
M. Schanberger, of Baltimore.
Jake Wells, Southern Circuit.
E. F. Albee, representing B. F. Keith.
A. Paul Keith: J. J. Murdock, executive manager of the United Booking Office, and Martin Beck, of the Orpheum Circuit.

These contracts call for the installation of the Kinetophone in the following theatres:

Shea's Theatres, Toronto and Buffalo.
Temple Theatres, Detroit and Rochester.
Orpheum Theatre and Bushwick Theatre, Brooklyn.
Bronx, Alhambra, Colonial, Fifth Avenue, Union Square Theatres, New York.
Keith's Theatres at Philadelphia, Cleveland, Toledo, Columbus, Indianapolis, Cincinnati and Louisville.
Grand Theatre, Syracuse.
Orpheum Theatres at Los Angeles, San Francisco, Seattle, Portland, Ore., Spokane, St. Louis, Minneapolis, Des Moines, Salt Lake City, Duluth, Oakland, New Orleans, Memphis, Sioux City, Lincoln, Winnipeg, Kansas City, St. Paul, Omaha, Denver, Birmingham and Nashville.
Majestic and Palace Theatres at Chicago.
Majestic Theatre, Milwaukee.
Lyric Theatre, Mobile.
Grand Theatre at Atlanta and Macon.
Empire Theatre, Richmond.
Maryland Theatre, Baltimore.
Proctor's Theatre, Newark.
Empire Theatre, Edmonton, Canada.
Sherman Grand Theatre at Calgary, Canada.

That talking pictures are an assured fact cannot be doubted when these men—the wisest in their profession—were willing to so promptly back their judgment with their dollars.

Many attempts have been made heretofore to produce talking pictures by making the record and film separately. The result was generally ludicrous as absolute synchronism was impossible. By the Edison method the actors perform exactly as they do upon the dramatic stage and the picture negative and phonograph record are taken simultaneously. This method not only assures perfect synchronism but an illusion that is startling. The voice seems to come from the lips of the performer no matter where located and every sound, such as footsteps, are faithfully reproduced.

A synchronizing device, like the one attached to the camera, is also attached to the projecting machine. This device is so constructed that it controls the operator, preventing him from turning his crank at any other speed than that demanded by the phonograph. After the start he can turn his back to picture and maintain synchronism to the exactness of a fraction of a second.

The records are made of indestructible material and will last indefinitely. The volume is sufficient to be heard in the largest theatres. The film is made jointless, which reduces the chances of breaking fully 95 per cent, as only defective machines or rank carelessness can break jointless film.

It must be remembered that the Kinetophone is the invention of the inventor of both the phonograph and motion pictures, and is built in the only establishment in the world completely equipped for all branches of the business. It is said Mr. Edison has considered this problem for thirty-seven years, but it is only during the past four years that he has succeeded in developing a phonograph recorder of sufficient delicacy to catch sound waves at a distance which permitted the actors to perform normally and be outside the field of the lens.

It is firmly believed by all who have seen the Kinetophone that it will not only revolutionize the picture business but the dramatic stage as well. So realistic are the pictures that one forgets he is witnessing a mechanical production in his interest in the subject.

The American Talking Machine Company, the distributing agents, believe by placing the machines in the leading vaudeville houses, the rank and file of amusement men will be enabled to witness the Kinetophone in operation, saving a trip to New York. However, contracts are rapidly being made for machines and film service in all sections of the country.

The addition of the Kinetophone to the picture show will enable the audience to enjoy grand and light opera, instrumental music, sparkling comedies, monologues, lectures by prominent people, and in fact every form of amusement now offered by the regular dramatic and operatic stage.

The Kinetophone is claimed to be the greatest invention of the "wizard of sound and sight," Thomas A. Edison, and countless millions of people in generations to come will be made happier by this remarkable achievement.

For our readers' information the following remarks are interesting.

Said Mr. Edison to Messrs. Albee, Beck, Murdoch and the other showmen who gathered at his West Orange studio:

"I am proud to have convinced professional theatrical men of the merits of the kinetophone. You are a proverbially hard audience, and in pleasing you I have passed the acid test. The fact that you wish to install the kinetophone in your theatres as soon as we can supply them means that you agree with me that the age of the scientific stage has arrived. I am certain that science is destined to play as great and as revolutionary a role in the theatre as it has in every other department of human endeavor. Now that the projection of voice and motion is perfect, I promise you a series of talking pictures that will exceed in permanent interest anything that the playhouse has ever known.

"The kinetophone will be demanded by the people in every city and town of this country and of the world, and I want to have it installed everywhere. It has been a labor of love with me for a generation."

As a result of the record-breaking orders for talking picture projecting machines, the Edison plant is working night and day making apparatus, and the Edison studios in the Bronx are using every hour of daylight in making records, while prominent players of the legitimate and operatic and concert stages are being signed for kinetophone productions with all-star casts.

KINEMACOLOR OPENS BRANCH OFFICES

The Kinemacolor Company of America has opened a branch office in Cincinnati, Ohio, at No. 132 East Fourth avenue. J. L. Kempner is temporarily in charge of this office and will remain in Cincinnati until the new office is thoroughly settled into its routine.

All the territory adjacent to Cincinnati will be served by the new office and this territory will include all of the State of Pennsylvania, with the exception of Pittsburgh, where the Grand Opera House, which has the exclusive Kinemacolor service for that city, will continue to receive its service from the New York office of the Kinemacolor Company of America.

It is announced that within the next three months branch offices will be installed in many of the larger cities of the United States, these offices being so located geographically as most conveniently to serve the rapidly growing number of theatres which have contracted for the exclusive service of natural color motion photographs furnished by this company.

As a result of the advertising recently appearing in the trade papers, inquiries regarding the service are literally pouring into the office of the Kinemacolor Company of America. The policy of giving each subscriber to the service, not only strictly first run reels, but, in addition, protection against competition, is a policy which will be strictly adhered to.

MORE FAMOUS PLAYERS

Following the announcement of the release of "The Prisoner of Zenda" with James K. Hackett in his famous dual role, comes the added news from the Famous Players Company that their next production will star Ethel Barrymore, one of the leading American actresses. This promises to be one of the greatest film achievements ever given to the public. The subject in which Miss Barrymore is to star has not yet been decided, but it will be one to afford her ample opportunity for a display of her charming art and appealing characterization.

Blanche Bates will very likely follow Ethel Barrymore, making the fourth of the famous players to be released by that company. Although "Queen Elizabeth," with Sarah Bernhardt in her famous role, is still the sensation of the country, "The Prisoner of Zenda" is reported to eclipse the former production, and it is the ambition and determination of the Famous Players Company to increase the merit of each succeeding production, difficult as that may be imagined to be.

A striking innovation to be inaugurated by the Famous Players is the engagement of several prominent dramatic authors to write original picture plays for the company's purposes. This signifies the integrity of the Famous Players Company's purpose to elevate the production of motion pictures to the standard of a better element of the legitimate drama.

CEDAR FALLS, IA.—L. J. McClinton will be manager of a new theatre to be opened up in this city.

KIRKWOOD, ILL.—Good Hope is to have a new opera house.

TOLEDO, O.—A new moving picture theatre will be opened up in this city. Manager, Walter B. Moore.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN.—The Piedmont Amusement Co.; capital, $5,000. Incorporators: W. M. Bratton, Lewis Wassman, C. W. Walters and others.

CINCINNATI, O.—Woodward Theatre Co., brick picture theatre building, Main and Webster streets. $10,000.

SEDALIA, MO.—Jno. W. Hicks, Jr., bought the Electric and Palace Theatres from Frank Bailey.

LOUISVILLE, KY.—Plans have been prepared for the erection of a new theatre building to cost $350,000 on Fourth Street opposite the Seelbach Hotel.

BROOKLYN, N. Y.—A contract has been let for the erection of a theatre building. Cost $10,000. Owner, Ditmas Theatre Corporation.

CABBY AND THE DEMON
Majestic release January 21st.

"SATAN"

(Ambrosio Four-Reel Feature)

One of the most remarkable of modern dramas has been conceived in the Ambrosio production of "Satan," which visualizes in the most vivid manner the workings of the evil one through the ages—the different eras of history and humanity.

The drama is divided into four parts, as follows: "Satan Against the Creator," "Satan Against the Savior," "Satan in the Middle Ages" and "Satan of To-day."

The first part is a realistic presentation of the struggle between heaven and earth as described by the poet Milton in his famous work. The portrayal in the film of the struggles of Satan to gain sway over heaven, his tempting of Adam and Eve, his arousing of the jealousy of Cain against Abel, the slaying of Cain by his son Nimrod in his mad desire to possess the beautiful daughter of Abel, the erection and the fall of the Tower of Babel are things most impressive to the minds of onlookers.

Then comes "Satan Against the Savior" (from "Messiah" by Klopstok), in which Satan strives to overthrow the Savior during his sojourn on earth. The final scene of the tomb, where Satan, having desired to prevent the resurrection of Jesus, finds all his efforts futile. The sepulchral stone begins to shake, Satan in despair tries to force it back, but without avail. Some mysterious power finally forces it from its place and it falls over on him. In triumph the soul of Jesus comes forth from the sepulchre and ascends to heaven.

Following the story of Jesus comes the portrayal of the triumph of Satan and his ally, Alcohol. The close of this portion of the story shows Satan drinking a toast to the ruin and destruction of the human race.

And last but not least comes the part that strikes perhaps nearest home, from the fact that it brings us into a modern atmosphere. Here we see the ravages of evil passion, the lure of gold and its consequences, the demon of blood, etc.

No more poignant lesson could be taught in book or film than that which speaks to us through the Ambrosio production of "Satan." The film is also splendidly staged and wonderfully photographed.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

"Words, Just Words"

STRANGE, indeed, what foolish ideas prevail about writing. Take the young man, S. Cruso, for instance. Mr. Cruso wrote to the judge in Kansas City, asking to be sentenced to prison for three years. He explained that he wished to master the spelling and meaning of every word in the dictionary and a prison alone could furnish him the necessary isolation and freedom from outside interruptions. "I am willing to commit something that will give you jurisdiction to give me a prison sentence," wrote S. Cruso. Mr. C. has the wrong theory. Words do not make literature, no matter how high-sounding or grandiloquent they may be. Every day we receive picture play scripts filled with high-sounding adjectives and word paintings. Many of the writers seem to think that the facility of stringing words together in a pleasing way is of primest importance. Really the talent of fine writing is of minor consequence. The importance of style is vastly overrated. That is only a means to an end. It merely makes the journey you take with an author the more pleasing in fiction and amounts to little or nothing in picture play writing.

The essential thing is to have something to say, and then to say it as logically and as expeditiously as possible. You must have a story to tell; a beautiful thought; a poetic idea; the ability to see character and situation; to devise plots; to stir emotions. And when one or more of these gifts are a writer's, then the more simply the thought is expressed, the idea phrased, the greater the effect. Stained glass windows are beautiful but they do not let the light through in the right way. They color and distort it. And a ponderous, a pompous, a merely literary style, hampers the free and natural expression of the writer.

The way between two minds should be as clear and as straight as it can be made. The best writers are the simple ones, and this simplicity is a matter of work and worry. The man who has it naturally is indeed fortunate. Scott and Dumas failed to achieve it, great writers though they were. Robert Louis Stevenson worked for years to master the simple style; De Maupassant, whose every word tells in narrative or description, served the severest kind of apprenticeship for seven years before he was allowed to sell a single story.

If Mr. S. Cruso had asked to be marooned from the world, as was Mr. R. Crusoe, to study how few words he needed, then his request would have been more commendable, or he might shut himself up in his library like Kipling, take Webster, and study twelve hours a day on simple, easily formed adjectives. Seven years ago we sold our first magazine story. Our friend, Eugene Wood, read it and wrote "Conquer that 'mandarin' style of yours or you will never sell another." Simplicity and clearness in diction is essential to success in any kind of literature, including script writing.

Now Real Estate Editor

Ralph D. Stoddard, who had the honor of originating and editing the first picture play page in a metropolitan newspaper, has been promoted to real estate editor of the Cleveland Sunday Leader.

A Delectable Privilege

A weekly house organ recently published a thrilling story of a near-wreck of the good ship "Savinella." There was a breathless description of "the camera man lashed to the centre-piece" Centre-piece is good, and doubtless the old salts will recognize it without sub-titles. Mantlepiece or couch-cover might as appropriately have been utilized. So you see, dear script writers, that even the best of 'em occasionally become overenthusiastic.

Reorganization Planned

There is a movement afoot to reorganize the central script clearing department of the Universal. Several script readers, formerly employed under Hal Reid, may be called in. However, there will be no call for Hal. It is also hinted that the Universal will soon boost the prices for scripts. Director Warren, of the Victor, will continue to select his own scripts without any outside aid and will continue to pay good prices for them as in the past.

Powers Prize Contest

The Powers Prize Contest was conducted fairly enough and the money paid. However, none of the prize-winning scripts has yet been produced. C. B. Hoadley originated the contest and was successfully conducting it when, it is said, Hal Reid took command. The winning scripts are deserving but the directors, it is said, thought they should have been consulted and have not been working overtime handling the scripts purchased during the contest.

A Pessimistic Poet

The late Will Hubbard Kernan was known to the Southland as "The Pessimistic Poet." He wrote good stuff and we are fortunate in possessing a volume of his verses, now said to be out of print. Mr. L. Case Russell, of Brooklyn, N. Y., has evidently had one or two scripts rejected and courts the muse, a la Kipling. He also writes very good stuff, but we suggest that his next contribution be not quite so pessimistic. Kipling's verse always did give us the cold shivers, anyway. Here is what Mr. Russell recently got out of his system:

The Photoplay Editor

A writer there was and he wrote a play,
(Even as you and I),
With plot and action and titles gay,
(He sent it out, but it didn't stay)
But he mailed it again the following day),
(Even as you and I).

Oh, the inks we waste and the thinks we waste,
And the work of our head and hand,
To an editor goes who does not know,
(And now we know he cares not to know),
And will not understand.

A writer there was and he wrote a play,
(Even as you and I),
Full of "punch," with a plot of note,
(He was sure it would get the editor's goat),
So to buy the stamps he pawned his coat,
(Even as you and I).

Oh, it isn't the stamps nor the writer's cramps
That make you with anger burn.
It's taking a dime from your savings bank
To see so many plays that are rank,
While your own good plays return.

Plays That "Talk"

Edison has succeeded in his "talking plays" invention. It was tried out the other day and moving picture plays "that talk" promise to be the latest card before so very long. Undoubtedly, in time, this will mean the dialogue script. It will also mean more advantages for the energetic and experienced playwright. Words will be written for the characters in the picture plays to say and hence more scope will come in the work. However, all this is yet in the future. It does not mean that repartee is now wished for in the picture play script.

Stick to Legitimate Markets

From the "rock-bound coast of Maine" comes a cry of distress from a picture playwright. He sent a script three months ago to the "Doorknob" Film Co., together with return postage. No report cometh and no answers to repeated queries. How often must we advise our readers not to forward scripts to virtually unknown producers? Stick to the recognized and legitimate markets. We would advise "Maine" to inform the concern by registered letter that the script is withdrawn and to rewrite his carbon copy and submit it elsewhere.

Don't Eat Rich Food

The first rule of health hygiene is not to eat rich food at bedtime, and then you will experience no bad dreams. A young authoress of Omaha, Neb., has evidently violated the health rules, for she is all tangled up with "dreams" and "visions" in her scripts. Unless you are a writer of long experience, we would advise the elimination of all dreams, visions, etc., in scripts. Tell a simple, direct story and permit the director to attend to the "vision" end.

"Outlines of Plays"

De Funiak Springs, Fla., wishes to know if companies advertising for "outlines of plays" desire synopses of plays similar to those printed each week in the trade journals. They do not. Write a good original plot, with brief but comprehensive synopsis and layout of action.

Getting "In Bad"

Here is something timely for the energetic writer to submit the same script to two film manufacturers at the same time. A. W. Thomas, associate editor of the Photoplay Magazine, and one of the most versatile writers in Filmland, writes to an Illinois picture playwright: "If you want to get 'in bad' with two film manufacturers instead of one, you have taken the finest way in the world to do so. The idea! You should have known better than to send the same scenario to two editors. Suppose they both accept it, what are you going to do?

A New Contract

Here is a new contract from an Ohio "university" which is forwarded to the "come-on":

> "I enclose herewith two dollars for which send me by return mail your complete set of instructions for writing moving picture plays, sample plays, list of prominent film producers in the market for plays and with the understanding that I may write to you at any time asking any questions pertaining to this work. Signed ——"

A St. Louis scribe enclosed the above agreement with a letter to Horace Vinton, well known script editor, actor and director. In part, the letter read:

> "I was just on the point of sending the two dollars when I read your article in the Moving Picture News of December 7th, in condemnation of 'schools' and 'associations.' The last three words 'save your money' is the best advice you can give."

It is good advice and comes from an authority.

Do Not Become Discouraged

Keep sweet; do not become discouraged. When the scripts come back with saddening regularity, buck up! You are becoming educated and more expert with every script you carefully evolve and send on its travels. Some weeks ago we went to our "morgue." "Morgue" is our pet name for that desk department where we file our rejected scripts. There were twenty reposing there. Twenty scripts that had been rejected. My, me! Then we mentally ejaculated: Odd Bodkins! Gazooks! By my Halidom! or some other convincing expletive, and went to work. Result: There are but fifteen scripts reposing in the "morgue," for five are sold. Remember that there is no such thing as "an inside writer." They all get them back. And when they do come back, let 'em repose awhile in the "morgue." Then take them out after a while and try to improve them. We are going to try and improve those other fifteen scripts so they will market.

How Do You Spell Village?

We saw an appealing play yesterday that was ruined by a letter which spelled the word "village" "villiage." The new spelling caused giggles where they were not desired. Then, too, it was a business letter written out in long-hand. There are very few New York business houses these days that send out business epistles in long-hand. They use the typewriter. Just little details which should not be overlooked. Details are important in picture play work.

FAMOUS PLAYERS ANNOUNCE TWO FAMOUS PLAYERS

Following the Famous Players Film Company's announcement of their coming release of the "Prisoner of Zenda," with James K. Hackett in his famous role, carrying an abundance of importance in itself, comes the added news that he is to be followed by Ethel Barrymore, one of the best known American actresses of the contemporary stage. Wonder follows wonder.

Each of these announcements in itself signifies the advanced movement in the evolution of film production that cannot be wholly estimated. For an actor of James K. Hackett's dramatic calibre to transfer his romantic art to the film, is pregnant with purport. For an actress of Ethel Barrymore's importance in stage events, to follow upon the screen with the charm and appeal characteristic of her brings to evidence the timely truth that the motion picture is being elevated to a stage and grade equal to, if not surpassing, that of legitimate productions.

The motion picture industry—manufacturers and exhibitors alike—and the great public are indebted to the activity, energy and enterprise of the Famous Players Film Company for bringing about this desirable end. That its labor will exert a commanding influence upon the dramatic trend of the age is as certain as that the advancement for which it is striving will earn immediate and lasting rewards.

WHERE is the Hercules who will dare to clean the Augean stables of the varieties? When will vaudeville become clean, and when will it be finally separated from moving picture theatres? It will take a Hercules, indeed, to accomplish the transformation that is so much needed. The much vaunted "family vaudeville" is not fit to be thought of in any good family circle.

* * * *

Vaudeville has no place in the moving picture theatre. Good pictures and low horse play can never dwell together satisfactorily. We are, in fact, in danger of going back to the level of low indecency from which we were lifted for a time. These immoral offenses of vaudeville have undergone a change, to be sure. Where before they were broad and obvious, like all the so-called comedy, they are now fairly subtle, covert and insidious. But they are there.

* * * *

We have entered many a picture theatre in fear and trembling, for we have seen the uplifting influence of many a dignified and clean-cut picture ruined by the following cheap vaudeville performances. It may be remarked that it is always the performers with the least talent who indulge in the lowest and coarsest remarks and business. Performers who have no real skill and who, nevertheless, feel it incumbent upon them to entertain the audiences of moving picture theatres, too often rely on vulgarity to carry them through. The point is that any sort of impurity or suggestiveness, whether veiled in the picture or unveiled during the accompanying vaudeville, creates an atmosphere that is unhealthy and unwholesome, especially to young people who know perfectly well that something "off color" has been acted or said and who may possibly start an investigation.

The moving picture houses giving both vaudeville and pictures are becoming strictly in the minority. Many people of more or less refinement are revolting. Most of them are forsaking any kind of vaudeville for the out-and-out moving picture show, for at these places of entertainment there is no language used to convey vulgar thoughts. And perhaps that is one reason why the legitimate moving picture theatre is continually growing in public favor.

When a strip of film in the moving picture machine of a New York theatre caught fire the other day, the usual panic did not follow. Not even when two young fellows, seeing a thin stream of smoke issuing from a window, rushed into the theatre and shouted, "Fire!" at the top of their lungs did the spectators take alarm. They remained perfectly quiet, calmly awaiting the presentation of the next picture, even after the two excited youths had turned in a fire alarm, calling to the scene engines, trucks, hose wagons, water towers and other fire-fighting apparatus. This audience was, of course, the exceptional audience. Most audiences in a similar situation might have started a wild stampede.

Not even the fact that there was no real fire and no evidence of fire inside the theatre would have prevented a panic ordinarily. But if the audience was exceptional, the two young men who so frantically gave the alarm were not. They proved to be quite the conventional type. There are always such volunteer heralds of disaster around and ready to do their deadliest, and to them belongs the responsibility of many a disaster. It is very gratifying to read of this one audience that kept its wits; it is less gratifying to learn that the two alarmists who failed to keep theirs were suffered to depart in peace. The law could not reach them but there should be somebody around every moving picture theatre to reach such irresponsible persons in time to prevent panics.

There is a proposition in Germany to pass a law abolishing dime novels and sensational literature generally, the idea being received with great favor by the people. The new measure, which will become a law, will provide a heavy penalization for the display and sale of this kind of literature. A number of newspapers are advocating such legislation for this country. The Ohio State Journal of Columbus, Ohio, believes such a law would do more good in the long run than a Panama Canal or Interstate Commerce Commission. It would help on with the honest and serious thinking of the people; it would exalt and beautify knowledge; it would build up a thoughtful citizenship. We talk about personal liberty—here is Germany attacking it with a vim—telling people what they shall not read and see. What a man reads and sees, so he too often thinks, and as he thinks, he is. Think of a citizenship filling the proportions of a dime novel or a moving picture film seething with crime! Can anyone imagine that such a citizenship is worthy of a Republic? Well, it is not esteemed worthy of a monarchy. Let us have it in this country, too. Let us legislate for real, honest, refined and uplifting things, and this is one of them. The moving picture theatre can get along without the criminal hero, the divorcee, or the husband who urges his wife to go visiting so he can "spoon" with the housemaid. There are plenty of themes and plots without descending to the luridly sensational or to the suggestive.

Those who believe in the moving picture idea, who see in these shows an admirable form of entertainment for everyone, should be strongest in their support of the honest effort of the Moving Picture News to eliminate objectionable features. If the campaign is carried to its desired completion, the moving picture will become an unquestioned force for everything that is good in any community. If the campaign for the decent picture is not won, Cinematography will find itself once again combating enlightened public opinion. It should not be imagined that censoring should be carried to absurdity. All kinds of dramas can be presented as heretofore, tragedies, comedies, farces, historical sketches, fairy tales, stories of adventure—even the woolly West, and the picturesque cowboy of the imagination need not be entirely banished.

It should be understood that the News opposes only the lurid and inexcusable pictures of crime and immorality. The films that are taboo are usually cheap in execution and puerile in conception. They appeal, not to the solid majority of patrons of the shows, but to the small boys and the weak-brained adolescents. They detract from the prestige of a theatre which shows them, and tend to have a deteriorating effect on the quality if not the quantity of the theatre's clientele. Such a reform must tend in the end to enhance the value of the exhibitors' business.

J. W. Teach, manager of Dreamland Theatre, Springfield, O., is one of the enlightened exhibitors of the country. His theatre is a model and his pictures perfectly projected. Mr. Teach, speaking for central Ohio exhibitors, is strongly against the crime picture and recently quit the service of a certain exchange because he would not stand for the unduly sensational and suggestive. "We can get along without so much binding, gagging and gunplay," said Mr. Teach. The Springfield exhibitors have won their battle with the powers and are showing on Sunday. They contribute a percentage of the Sunday receipts to the Clark County Tuberculosis Camp.

Colonel Roosevelt spoke on "The History of Literature" in Boston recently. He discussed at considerable length the art of history from the standpoints of science, poetry, mythology and literature. He argued that history should welcome the entrance upon its domain of every science and that future historians should make use of material from every possible course to convey vivid and life-like pictures to others of the past whose secrets they lay bare. The great historian of the future, he declared, would be the man who had the genius to reconstruct for his readers the immense panorama of the past.

And this is a field in which enters the faithfully enacted and produced picture of American life of to-day. One hundred years from now, these pictures will have their necessary places in history's pages. Then can the American of that future day have impressed upon him the scenes and problems of present-day American life.

PROPRIETORS OF THEATRES AND MOVING PICTURES WIN AN IMPORTANT POINT

For a number of years there has been a good deal of agitation concerning standees at places of amusement. This has been particularly true in moving picture shows. The Fire Department of the City of New York has for sometime past been endeavoring to take very stringent measures concerning these shows.

Section 762 of the New York Charter prohibited standees of any kind, but the section provided that the City of New York could have home rule on the matter of standees, and empowered the Board of Aldermen to repeal that section of the charter relating to standees and substitute therefore its own ordinance. A violation of the section of the charter was punishable by a heavy fine and a long jail term.

Last year the New York Board of Aldermen passed a substitute ordinance, and that ordinance provided that a violation of the ordinance should be punishable by the penalties theretofore prescribed for the violation of the old charter regarding standees. The authorities construed that to mean that that constituted a misdemeanor and was punishable by a fine and jail sentence.

Counselor Tobias A. Keppler was retained by Alderman Max Levine, who is the attorney for a proprietor of a moving picture show on Forsythe street, who was charged with a violation of the ordinance. After a very lengthy argument between Mr. Keppler and Assistant Corporation Counsel McNulty, who went exhaustively into the law, the Court of Special Sessions held that the violation of the ordinance was not a crime.

Thereupon the corporation counsel then stated that the defendant should be tried for maintaining a nuisance and endangering the lives of the inmates of the moving picture show because he permitted the standees to crowd the aisles and passageways. Briefs are to be submitted on this proposition within a week.

This is the first effort ever made to prosecute proprietors of places of amusement for maintaining a nuisance. If the law holds it is a nuisance, every person owning or managing any places of public assembly which the authorities may claim is overcrowded will be liable to be prosecuted for a nuisance, which is punishable by a year in jail or five hundred dollars fine or both. Mr. Keppler says that in his opinion the acts complained of do not constitute a nuisance as a matter of law.

ANOTHER NEW COMPANY

This time one is starting under good auspices for the manufacture of commercial, dramatic and educational films. The gentlemen connected with it are Mr. C. P. Ryttenberg and Mr. J. W. Noble. Mr. Noble has been known through the film world for a long time and his products have had an extended sale. It was he who first made Thanhouser famous as his director, and then transferred his services to Laemmle and latterly to the Gem, both connected with the Universal.

Messrs. Ryttenberg and Noble take with them to the studio in City Island Miss Sadie Weston, who has become so well known in the Gem productions. It is not known at the present time under what banner the films will be released, but any of our readers desiring further particulars can write to the Ryno Film Company, City Island, New York, in care of Mr. Ryttenberg.

LYNCHBURG, VA.

It is reported that the Academy of Music, which was destroyed by fire two years ago and rehabilitated and put in commission on the 11th of December, will, through the Summer months, be used as a motion picture and vaudeville house. Heretofore the Academy has been "dark" after the theatrical season closed. The new playhouse is leased by Jake Wells and is under the management of Charles E. Kessnich, of Richmond, who was formerly connected with the Mutual Film Corporation.

Glayda Newton, the "Chicago soprano," who has been filling an engagement at the Belvedere Theatre, has gone to Jacksonville, Fla., to join her husband, who is also a singer of some ability.

In the Vitagraph picture, "Bunny All at Sea," which was released recently, appear two Lynchburg people, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas O. Watts, who were aboard the liner Berlin when the scenes for the picture play were caught by the camera man. Mr. and Mrs. Watts are seen dancing on deck while the Vitagraph players are at work.

EDITOR OF RED BANK REGISTER LAUDS MOVING PICTURES

The editor of the Red Bank Register evidently understands to its fullest extent the old adage "Boys will be boys," and speaks with the sympathy of a heart that has never grown old of moving pictures as amusement for the children. The following quotations from the editorial in the Red Bank Register of December 11th, based on local censorship may interest our readers, and are conducive to serious thought on the matter:

"The wrangle over the censorship of moving pictures in Red Bank seems to me to be a good deal of a tempest in a teapot. It reminds me of the warfare which was maintained against 'dime novels' when I was a boy. These 'dime novels' were sold at ten cents each, as the name implies. Other books were also sold at ten cents each, but the general term of 'dime novel' was restricted to little books published for boys. Any boy who in those days was seen reading a 'dime novel' was regarded as being on the straight downward path to perdition. These books were frowned upon by parents, denounced by clergymen, and raided and confiscated by school teachers. It was the fashion in those days for everyone who put up a pretence of being 'cultured,' or who pretended to be a little better than his neighbors, to set up a cry against 'dime novels' whenever the subject came up in conversation.

"The dime novels about which there was so much discussion and which were so roundly condemned half a century ago were good straightaway stories of adventure. They were read eagerly by every wholesome-minded boy. Occasionally there was a little mite of a love story running through the book, but mostly this was cut down to almost nothing.

"To-day the moving pictures have taken the place of these books of twenty-five and fifty years ago. I believe the moving pictures are just as clean and just as wholesome as the dime novels which were so grossly traduced half a century ago. Moving pictures are better than the old-time dime novels in one way. They appeal directly to the eye, and the scenes which it took pages in the book to describe can be shown better and more vividly in moving pictures in one-tenth of the time it took to read the story.

"I believe that the manufacturers of moving pictures are just as earnest in cutting out everything of a vulgar and indecent nature as were the publishers of the old-time dime novels. There no doubt are manufacturers of moving pictures who make and sell vulgar and indecent pictures, just as there are now and always have been since printing was invented publishers who print indecent books. But these books are not found in reputable book stores, and moving pictures of this class are not found in reputable theatres nor anywhere else, except in 'wide-open' towns.

"As for censorship, the people themselves are the best censors. Let any moving picture house show indelicate or indecent pictures and the business of that place will immediately fall off, just as the trade of any book store or picture store will fall off if that store exhibits indecent pictures or books in its show windows. The people can be trusted to guard public decency vastly better than a little group of 'better-than-thou' persons can be trusted to do it. The theory of a local board of moving picture censors is a fool idea to start with."

MUTUAL OPENS EXCHANGE IN BUFFALO, N. Y.

The Mutual Film Corporation, in response to the urgent requests of exhibitors of Western New York, has opened a branch exchange in Buffalo, the temporary quarters of which are located at 35 Niagara Street.

Exhibitors of Buffalo and vicinity quickly showed their appreciation of this, and in four days after its opening the exchange had ten customers. Several more are being added every day. The manager is Max Schachtel, formerly of the Lake Shore Film and Supply Company, and his assistant is M. Malaney, also of the Lake Shore. Both are well known in the film business.

The Mutual, of Buffalo, is now in a position to handle every grade of service and, at the present rate of growth, it will be one of the most favorable of all Mutual offices within a year. A complete line of supplies will be carried in connection with its films.

The exchange has secured more elaborate quarters, to which it will move as soon as they are available to its use.

FAMOUS PLAYERS FILM COMPANY WINS LEGAL BATTLE

Infringement Suit Against the Selig Company Ends in Decisive Victory

One of the most sweeping legal victories ever achieved was won by the Famous Players Film Company, when the Supreme Court last Monday (January 13th) directed an injunction against the General Film Company, restraining the Selig Polyscope Company from selling, renting or exhibiting its production of "Monte Cristo," on the ground that it was a direct infringement of the copyright version of the play owned exclusively by James O'Neill, the film production of which is controlled by the Famous Players Film Co.

The case was argued several weeks prior to the rendering of the decision, which proves that the legal verdict was carefully considered. The court held that the Selig production had closely imitated Mr. O'Neill's copyright version of the play and had reproduced the scenes and action bodily.

The decision has a far-reaching effect in that it establishes a legal precedent that indicates the copyright status of a dramatic production in its relationship to the motion picture, a question which has heretofore been entirely equivocal, and places the motion picture in a definite and distinct position as a dramatic production.

The decision eliminates the assumption prevalent in film circles that a manufacturer had an ethical and legal right to produce in motion pictures a work which had been copyrighted in play or book form, as long as the film production departed from the copyright version in such scenes or details of action upon which the copyright may have been based, but reproducing the work in essence and spirit without any visible hindrance. By the text and spirit of the present decision, legal authority is advanced which grants a popular novel or play complete copyright protection as respects the work in its entirety, and automatically prohibits a film production based upon the theme in question, or the original from which it may be derived, to so close a detail as the title of the work.

This comprehensive decision is practical, feasible, and generally convenient. It denotes an absolute judgment whereby film manufacturers can know without question or doubt what subjects are available for production and what are prohibited. It furthermore removes all temptation from manufacturers to produce a motion picture of a copyright play or book on the hollow, suppositious chance of avoiding such parts of the original as are covered by copyright. In such cases where the title of a standard work is its most valuable asset, the possibility of its being assumed for film production without legal and adequate arrangement is wholly eliminated.

This phase of the court's decision is particularly pleasing to the Famous Players Film Company, as the famous plays which it has arranged to produce will, by the terms of this drastic ruling, be fully protected from even fractional imitation and semi-adaptation.

The concensus of opinion in film circles tends to signify that the ruling of the court is wholly just and equitable, and that it throws considerable light on the hitherto complex and confusing copyright question, and it is considered that the decision will herald a more harmonious co-relationship between film manufacturers and such other kindred elements associated with their industry. It is the popular opinion that the Selig Company, the defeated defendant in the issue which introduced this striking decision, should welcome it inasmuch as it establishes a practical guidance which will simplify and standardize the copyright question.

When seen at his office regarding the victory of his company, Mr. Zukor, the president of the Famous Players Film Company, said: "I believe our victory is a general one. The court's decision dispenses with a recurrent and annoying question. The copyright department's authority, as everyone in the industry has some time or other experienced, has always seemed an uncertain guide in the selection of eligible subjects. On the strength of this decision and by the precedent which it establishes, it will be a simple and convenient thing to avoid such works as are not in themselves copyrighted, but from which a copyrighted stage or picture version has been derived. I am very pleased that the motion picture industry has been aided by such a generally beneficial precedent as has been established in this issue."

Judge Coxe, of the United States Circuit Court, also granted an injunction against the stage exhibition of "Monte Cristo," holding Mr. O'Neill exclusive owner of the stage production.

The Famous Players Film Company and Mr. James O'Neill were represented by Messrs. Dittenhoeffer, Gerber & James, of 96 Broadway, New York City.

GAUMONT GRAPHIC

With a view to serving exhibitors better, the Gaumont Company, beginning Tuesday, January 28th, will publish weekly the Gaumont Graphic in an enlarged form. In its present state it is a semi-monthly paper. Its present limitations of space forbid giving information the exhibitor wants to know.

This paper will contain synopses and pages containing pictures and outlines of film stories, which pages can be detached and used for lobby display. The Graphic will also have a large page which will give the contents of the Gaumont Weekly, which page also may be detached and hung outside theatres to attract business.

While not attempting to compete with the trade journals in matters of general news, the editors of the Graphic will try to give to its pages sprightliness not attempted in contemporary publications of its class.

This paper will be issued free to any and all exhibitors. The editor will be glad to receive literary contributions, it being understood that they are gratis.

This paper will be edited by John B. Clymer, manager of Sale and Advertising. Contributing editors will be Frank E. Holliday, manager-editor of the Gaumont Weekly, and Carl Holliday, director of the Gaumont Educational Department.

KLEINE'S CINES AND ECLIPSE RELEASES

Two well-acted dramas and a splendid comedy constitutes the Kleine program for the week ending January 25, 1913.

"She Shall Not Know" is to be the Tuesday Cines. It describes the self-sacrifice and loving devotion of a girl who is forced to meet almost single-handed the misfortunes which visit a household after the death of the fond and loving father.

"Just Missed Him," the Wednesday Eclipse, is a first-class comedy, describing the antics of Sam Slick, who affords much amusement in his many hair-raising escapes from the police.

On with this subject is an interesting travelogue entitled "The Manchester Ship Canal," which takes us upon a trip along this busy canal from Easton to Manchester, during which we are shown many flourishing towns along the way and several marvelous feats of engineering.

For the Saturday release "Plot and Counterplot" is a detective story of unusual worth.

THE HUNDRED-DOLLAR BILL

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Majestic Release)

LUIGI stood on the corner looking up and down the street. He wanted work but he didn't know where to go. He had left home late, for the baby was sick and had cried all night. It had been fretting for several days and Luigi was beginning to think it must be really sick and that he ought to get some medicine. But he had no work, and without work there was no money.

The snow was falling softly around him and the sound of the feet of the passing crowd became more and more dull.

From time to time the man left his post and went several blocks, asking here and there for work, but always he came back to the same place.

He didn't go home, for there was no use. He could only meet his wife with a disappointing answer and look at the sick child without being able to relieve it.

So he stood waiting for he knew not what.

The afternoon wore on and the snow fell faster and thicker. Well, at any rate, he might be able to get a street-cleaning job the next day.

By four o'clock it was getting to be quite dark. Luigi was thinking he might as well go home when his attention was attracted by a well-dressed young man who suddenly appeared near him out of the storm.

Luigi watched him curiously for a moment. He seemed to be dazed and unfamiliar with his surroundings.

Finally Luigi stepped up to him and said, "Are you ill, sir,? Can I do anything for you?"

The young man looked at him vacantly for a moment. "I—I—lost my way. I—want to go home, but I lost my way."

"Are you sick? What can I do?" asked Luigi.

"Get me a taxi. The truth—is—my man, I'm drunk. I know when I'm drunk. Now, some fellows don't—know—when they're drunk. But—I do. Now, you get me—a taxi." He was holding affectionately to Luigi's arm.

"I'm afraid I'll have to go to Broadway for one. There ain't any here. Can you go with me? It's two blocks."

"All right, young man. I know—you're my friend. I'll go any place you tell me—any place you tell me."

Luigi took the man's arm and guided him along the slippery streets.

When they reached Broadway it was an easy matter to call a taxicab and put the young man into it.

"Thank you," he said, as he stepped unsteadily into the car. "You've been—great help. Take this—will you?"

He handed Luigi a folded bill. Luigi took it and said, "I will take it, sir. Not because I want pay for helping you, but because I need it very much. I'm out of work and my baby's sick."

"Sorry. Goo' luck—to you. Goo' by."

The young man gave the chauffeur an address and in a moment Luigi was left standing on the sidewalk, tightly clasping his bill.

Before the car had reached the next corner he had unfolded the bill and stood staring at it in the fast growing dark. His eyes refused to believe what they saw. He ran quickly to the nearest street light. No, his eyes were not deceiving him. He held in his hand a hundred dollar bill.

Of course it was a mistake. As quick as a flash he darted up the street after the taxicab. When he had run a block he suddenly realized that the car was not even in sight.

The next question was, what should he do? He felt sure it was a mistake that the bill was so large, but the young man had intended to give him something—perhaps five dollars. Why not have the money changed and use only what he actually had to. The owner would probably be on the lookout for him in that neighborhood and he could return him the rest of the money.

That seemed the only thing to do, so Luigi started to do it by going into a grocery store. He ordered what he wanted and it came to a little over a dollar. He handed the grocer the bill.

"What's this?" asked the man gruffly.

"It is a bill. I haven't anything else."

"You're a likely looking fellow to be having nothing but hundred dollar bills. I guess you better just take this and get your things somewhere else."

"What do you mean?"

The grocer looked at Luigi from under scowling, bushy brows. "I mean that I don't like the looks of your kind havin' a hundred dollar bill. That's all; now get out."

Luigi felt the blood rush to his face. His fist clenched and his nostrils dilated for a moment. Then his better judgment prevailed and he left the store without a word. He couldn't afford to run the risk of being arrested.

He tried the butcher and the baker, but they only gave him black looks of suspicion.

"If I could only get the baby some medicine, maybe it wouldn't matter so much about the food," he thought, and went into a drug store.

"Where did you get that?" asked the clerk.

"From a gentleman. He gave it to me."

"Maybe you got it from a gentleman, all right, but I don't see many of 'em givin' away hundred dollar bills. You'll have to go somewhere else to get the change for that."

It seemed useless. Discouraged, Luigi went back to the few rooms he called home. He had a hundred dollars and yet was no better off than if he had not a penny in the world.

The baby was sleeping, but her face was hot and dry and her breathing unnatural.

"What shall we do?" he asked his wife, when he had explained the situation to her.

"I don't know, but I feel that it will come out right. We had better sleep while we can and see what comes to-morrow."

This seemed a good suggestion and Luigi, after his tiresome day, was not loath to act upon it.

"Anyway, I'll be able to get work clearing away the snow to-morrow. It's still falling," said Luigi, before he slept.

He slept fitfully, dreaming of bills which no one would accept and of looking for work which he could never find.

In the early morning they were awakened by a strange noise coming from the baby's bed. They sprang up and ran quickly to its side. One glance, even in the dim light, was enough to tell them that the child was very ill. She lay with eyes closed and her breath coming with difficulty through her open mouth.

"Oh, she's worse, she's much worse," cried the mother. "You must go for the doctor. Go to the hospital and the charity doctor will come. He must, he must come!"

Luigi dressed as quickly as he could in clothes still wet from yesterday's exposure. He drew his wet shoes on with difficulty and limped down the dark stairs to the street.

The snow was deep and almost trackless. It was crisp and crunched under Luigi's feet as he walked in his stiff shoes.

Cold as it was the man was glad of the snow, for it very probably meent work, and work means money that he could spend. A dollar and a half was better than a hundred when he couldn't spend it.

When Luigi reached the hospital the visiting doctor had just arrived. He saw traces of real anxiety in the man's face and went with him at once.

"The child has pneumonia. Get this filled at once," the doctor said, a short time after he had come into the squalid room. He handed Luigi a prescription.

The man took it and hastened from the room. "Maybe they will change the money now," he thought, "if I have this prescription with the doctor's name on it."

He went to a different drug store from the one he went to the day before. He thought perhaps they might not be so suspicious on Broadway, and that they might recognize the doctor's name, so he went there.

The clerk filled the prescription without any questions. When he handed the bottle to Luigi, Luigi handed him his bill.

The clerk looked at it and then quickly at its owner,

"So you are the man, are you? We've been on the lookout for you, but we didn't expect you out so soon. We were informed that you were around trying to play this trick. Now you'll just stay here until I call the police."

The druggist went to the telephone which was between the door and Luigi.

"But the baby needs the medicine. Let me go home and I'll leave the bill with you," pleaded Luigi.

"No, that game won't work. Just stay where you are."

Just then the door opened and a customer came in. "Say, stand at the door a minute, will you?" said the clerk. "I'm trying to get the police station. This man's around trying to pass a counterfeit bill."

"Oh, sir, I'm not, I——" Luigi stopped in astonishment.

"Well, by jove, if it's not the man that did me a good turn yesterday. What's the matter?"

"The bill you gave me, sir. It's a very large one. I thought you made a mistake. But the baby is sick and I had no other money so I thought I'd spend a little of it and then try to find you to return the rest."

The man laughed. "I was in a bad fix yesterday, and I'll acknowledge that I didn't intend to give you quite so much. But you did me a good turn and I was very grateful. When I woke up this morning I remembered your face and that you said you were out of work. I liked you and I felt as though I wanted to see you again. I came down here where you were yesterday but I didn't expect to be rewarded so soon. Here, you idiot," he said to the clerk, "put that receiver up. You better learn to know an honest man when you see him."

He turned to Luigi. "Here, I'll change the bill and then you won't have any more trouble. Get what you want here and come along."

Luigi paid for the medicine and left the store with his new friend.

"I must go home at once, sir," he said, "for the baby needs the medicine."

"All right, run along, but come back here to this grocery store and we'll take some things home to the family."

Luigi ran all the way.

"Am I too late?" he gasped when he reached his own door and met his weeping wife.

"No," she said, "the doctor gave her something else and now he says she will get well."

"Then we have two reasons to be glad," said Luigi when he had gotten his breath, and he told his wife the good fortune that had come to them.

JOHN STEALS A FURLOUGH
Great Northern release January 25th.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT FILM MERITS

Essanay

"'Alkali Ike' in Jayville" is exceedingly good comedy. It has a touch of originality about it, and cannot fail to amuse.

Selig

"The False Order" is of the highly sensational sort, but not harmfully so. The story is full of interest, and although the drunkenness of a train dispatcher such as is represented in this film is rather an improbable occurrence, still we are prone to set aside any inconsistencies which may appear for the gripping interest which the story contains.

Kalem

"The Manicurist and the Mutt" is fairly rich in comedy—perhaps more than fairly so. The title is somewhat misleading, and it would seem, as the story progresses on the screen, that the word "mutt" should be used in the plural, so fast and furious do men to whom the name might justly be applied appear and succumb to the charms of the fair manicurist. This is really very good.

"Johnny Goes Ducking" is also very fair as a comedy of the farce order.

Vitagraph

"The Delayed Letter" is a drama of very excellent shaping. The plot of the story is interesting, and it is produced in such a manner as to hold the interest of the audience continuously.

Kinemacolor

"The Call of the Blood" has no special merit as a story, but as a wonderful photographic feat it stands supreme. Kinemacolor is specially adapted to the most beautiful in literature and art, therefore anything bordering on the ordinary in drama or slap-dash comedy should be religiously omitted from the Kinemacolor program.

Great Northern

"Who Is Most to Blame" is very fair in comedy. This film, though not specially elevating in theme, runs chances of eliciting more mirth than wrong-doing.

Lux

"Face to Face with a Leopard" is very excellent indeed. Theme, production and photography are satisfactory. In this picture the leopard is actually seen in attack.

"The Magic Carpet" is a comedy of the slap-dash order. We wish that European manufacturers would realize that something of a firmer foundation would be more acceptable to Americans. Good comedy consists of circumstantial happenings which appear ridiculous with little or no embellishment. This is the kind of comedy we want. It is, no doubt, the misunderstanding of European manufacturers of the requirements of the American market that is responsible for their folly.

Majestic

"Child Labor," from Majestic, is very good. Its appeal is quite strong, and dealing as it does with one of the vital questions of the day, it has a place in any institution.

Broncho

"In the Ranks," in two reels, is a very excellent military subject, well handled. This picture will prove most satisfactory for any theatre.

GREAT NORTHERN POSTERS

The Great Northern Special Feature Film Company is boasting of one of the most artistic of posters ever prepared for motion picture theatre display. "In a Den of Lions" and "Conquered, or the Madcap Countess," the two big features now being exploited by the company, afford excellent opportunity for the lithograph artist, and the posters covering these subjects are pronounced exceptional in every detail. There are one, three, six and nine sheets for "In a Den of Lions," and these portray scenes in actual circus and drawn from photographs. The nine-sheet showing wild animals in action under their tamer is an exceptional example of artistic poster work. The "paper" for "Conquered" is fully as attractive, and includes one, three and six-sheets, replete with detail. The three-sheet shows a thrilling rescue from drowning and the six-sheet depicts a giant loop the loop, around which the hero of the film feature rides in a motorcar.

"The Miracle" Music

The musical film is no longer an experiment, for in the past few weeks the New York Film Company's musical film, "The Miracle," was produced in Baltimore, Md., and Cleveland, O., using specially arranged orchestra scores and augmented orchestras meeting with great success. At about the same time the cinematographic reproduction of Prof. Max Reinhardt's spectacular production of "The Miracle" as produced at the Olympia London, with the music composed by Engelbert Humperdinck, was put on for an extended run at Covent Garden, London, using a large chorus and orchestra, also meeting with success. This would prove that the musical film will develop and is destined to be a valuable asset for the picture theatre.

While the New York Film Company's production of "The Miracle" is a German film, made by the Continental Kunstfilm Company, of Berlin, its conversion into a musical film is an American addition to a film which in itself could be mentioned as the greatest film projected on an American screen, for in this fact alone I found my inspiration for setting music to a film along ideas resulting from personal experiments made in picture playing. There is a great difference between setting a film to music and setting music to a film, but I have the assurance of the orchestra leaders who have conducted the New York Film Company's production of "The Miracle" that no special effort is necessary to properly play the music in harmony with the picture, yet the score contains the best compositions of the world's greatest composers.

In choosing "The Miracle" as a subject for my first efforts in advanced methods and better picture music, I had the choice of many, none offering the musical opportunities as seen in "The Miracle." The story musically suggests the devotional, semi-devotional, from there to the romantic, then going into the very highest of the dramatic, returning again to the devotional by degrees which are most beautifully portrayed in action and photography in this film. Were one to select a musical scenario, I could think of no subject offering more basic opportunities.

I can assure all exhibitors that in booking "The Miracle" they will have no difficulty in giving the production its proper musical setting, for in all my adaptions, arrangements and compositions, I have taken pains to make the score practical for the average pianist, as well as any combination of musicians.

I would suggest that you get the piano score in advance, as the cost is but 50 cents, and this contains all the necessary information for properly playing the picture. This score is not bound and most of the music, both descriptive and dramatic, can be used as excellent numbers for different scenes in other pictures, for you can be assured that you are getting more than a two-dollar value for fifty cents.

When using orchestra the necessary parts will be furnished by the state right buyers, and for such numbers as you continue in your repertoire, the orchestra parts as published by Carl Fischer, Cooper Square, N. Y., are in similar key and suited to the piano arrangement. For pianist-leaders in picture theatres "The Miracle" piano arrangement is indispensable, as it is both a lead as well as accompaniment part. Every action as well as scene in the 4,200 feet of film, is covered by music and nothing is left to the imagination. Proper prompts and segue cues are given which come to you in "The Miracle" score without effort.

It is surprising that at this time, while so many directors are getting excellent results in scenes wherein musical rhythm is an important factor, and yet many more give no thought whatsoever to this, and the scenes are gotten over with in so careless a manner, that the musician, unless he allows them to pass as nil he must of necessity feel greatly discouraged in his endeavors. While seeing a Western and a society drama on the same programme, the Western showing a dance hall scene and the society play an elaborate ballroom scene, in both the relevant action having dancing as a backing, I wondered how it was possible to obtain such good results in a Western studio with a rough setting, while the elaborate ballroom scene was very conspicuous in its lack of rhythm. Many directors surely close their eyes or neglect this in their rehearsals, for in most instances no endeavor is shown to keep the better dancers front screen when the scenes do show effort. This can easily be corrected, and will be gratifying to the musician, improve the picture in the eyes of the audience and do away with much of the uncomplimentary repartee so often heard in the picture theatre, for there are many picture theatregoers who are ever on the alert for just such happenings.

A still greater opportunity for criticism, which is detrimental to the picture in general, is afforded in pictures wherein the performing on a musical instrument is necessary, especially so in instances where stringed instruments are used. Many times such action borders on the serio-comic and is received by the audience in that manner, creating laughs at the most unnatural points. The character after such occurrence surely has lost its moral weight and the picture will consequently fall flat. There are very few people in the world who have never seen a stringed instrument played, and they all know that the tone is created between the fingerboard and the bridge and not over the fingerboard or behind the bridge as seems to be the impression in most of the picture portrayals. This is really a joke, and usually ill-timed, for it occurs in pictures where the undivided attention of the audience is essential to bringing out the better in the picture. This can be in part avoided by not using rosin on strings or bow, this alleviates the friction, and with little care, the performer will have no trouble in keeping his bow in proper position. The better way to avoid this evil is to cast characters that understand the instruments, which is often possible.

A further proof that the producers do not concentrate enough upon musical facts is shown in the very title of "The Stolen Symphony," a Lubin feature release in two parts. It is true that the people who would know or criticize this error are at present in the minority in the picture theatre, but in the present meritorious advance strides in the picture industry it is necessary to cater to this minority, for it is through them that the future greater patronage of the picture theatre will emanate.

Any dictionary or encyclopedia will explain that a symphony is an orchestral composition which musically works out a theme to a greater extent than a "sonata," which is a usual composition for piano.

"The Stolen Symphony" being performed on the piano in the Lubin release, it would seem that "The Stolen Sonata," concerto, or any other musical title for a piano composition would have been more appropriate and just as effective.

A very simple and effective way of toning to a picture can be found in certain entrances of the leading characters. By anticipating these entrances properly and making a decided crescendo until the character is well on, or until there is apparent a resumption of the dialogue, will give the character a pronounced future effect in the picture and make their work more impressive with the audience. For this reason especial care should be taken as to the musical number you are playing and that the character entrances so accentuated are those of the leading characters only and placed to their first entrances. This is more effective in bright scenes, and especially so when a young joyful character enters upon a quiet or pathetic scene, in which case a change of number or an increasing of the tempo is usually necessary.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION No. 1 OF NEW YORK

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Recording Secretary—George Epstein.
Secretary-Treasurer—Robert Levy.
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—Ralph Knaster.

Telephone—Stuyvesant 572.
Office—133 Third Avenue.

In the chat of this issue you will note the grand success of the above mentioned organization, which is in existence since the month of August, 1912. All records have been broken in making headway in this short time, and it seems almost impossible when it comes to actual figures. For five years the operators in New York City have been trying to organize properly, and that number of years ago a few so-called union men from a spotlight local, approached them and tried to teach them something that they themselves did not know, and it was only a case of "well, take a chance," and after chancing all these years, the operators of New York have learned that which the spotlight local did not know five years ago, and do not know to this day, and that is to harmonize, and let one man's difficulties be everyone's and everyone's difficulties can be brought to one head, thrashed out thoroughly and a remedy can be had to relieve the difficulty, which would satisfy all, and then there is real unionism and equality. Can you imagine that a local a little more than five months ago a few operators made up their mind to start a real union, not a part or branch or auxiliary, neither a department, but an organization whose name will be known throughout America as one of the leading and best managed locals. At the present and short time the membership has grown to a membership of five hundred and fifty, and the finances are extraordinary. These same men belonged to an auxiliary of Local No. 35, spotlight workers, for five years and after that time they were still in debt to that local about one hundred and fifty dollars. Can any fair-minded human being answer the problem, for after organizing the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union, No. 1, of New York, a little less than six months ago, the capital in bank is more than one thousand dollars, and before another month that amount will be trebled. This is something an organization can be proud of in spite of the fact that the former mother local has tried her utmost to hinder the progressive work which has been done. In this issue you will see the pictures of two members, namely, B. A. Friedman and John Rickard, the first mentioned is the chairman of the ball committee, and the second one is the secretary-treasurer of that committee. They are loyal workers of this organization, and it can be said that the success of the ball depends greatly upon them. They have been working day and night, neglecting their health, for the benefit of their brother members. Brothers Rickard and Friedman were successful in securing Mr. John Bunny of the Vitagraph players, and who has an engagement at Hammerstein's Victoria Theatre for the coming week at $1,000, to lead the grand march, with Miss Pearl White of the Crystal Film Company, and leading lady of that concern. This entertainment and ball of the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union, No. 1, which will be held at Palm Garden on February 10, 1913, is so well advertised that one of the superintendents of a large department store on Sixth avenue, New York, has placed tickets on sale at that particular store, because the employes had asked him to give information of the affair, and actually begged him to secure tickets for them. At the last meeting of the M. P. M. O. U., No. 1, John Bunny was made an honorary member, and the boys are proud to have among them the man that can really say he has the most well known and popular face in America.

B. A. FRIEDMAN
Chairman of the Ball Committee

JOHN RICKARD
Secretary-Treasurer of the Ball Committee

For the benefit of operators wishing to join Local No. 1, the entrance fee is $5.00 until February 15, 1913, after that date the entrance fee will be $25.00. So, be quick, and get into the local for the smaller amount, and apply to the office of the union, 133 Third avenue, near Fourteenth street, New York.

R. KNASTER,
Business Representative.

NOTICE—Next meeting of local No. 1 will be held January 20, 1913, at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street, New York, at 12 o'clock.

AN INTERESTING LETTER FROM CLEVELAND, OHIO.

Cleveland, Ohio, January 10, 1913.

To the Editor of the Moving Picture News:

I am pleased to know that you are so liberal as to open the pages of your valuable paper for the picture operators to express their views, and I wish to take advantage of the opportunity it affords me of reporting any news that I may wish to convey to my brothers throughout the country. I have been a subscriber for the News for about four years, but it is seldom that I read any news from our local, so I thought I would start the ball a-rolling myself.

The reports of the officers of 1912 were read at the last meeting, which instilled confidence and more enthusiasm than ever in the union, for the reports proved that there has been improvement in conditions and that our local can be pointed to with pride as one that does things, and in a conservative way. We are about 98 per cent organized now, with good prospects of bringing in the few who are holding out. With the thirteen new members that were installed at last meeting, we are in shape to furnish all unfair houses. The retiring officers were given a vote of thanks for their work of last year, and, in turn, offered their assistance to the new officers that were installed, as follows: President, S. M. Hulbert; vice-president, Sam Shaw; financial secretary-treasurer, Harland Holmden; recording secretary, L. Schafranek; sergeant-at-arms, H. J. DesChambeault; inner guard, Oliver Kurr; business agent, Benjamin Brown; executive board, Harland Holmden, Joe Shiever, Sam Shaw, James Foster, Frank Masek; trustees, H. J. DesChambeault, Frank Jaffa, H. M. Peckham; examining committee, C. M. Canfield, R. W. Mullen, Raymond Ray, James Foster, Sam Shaw; delegate to I. A. T. S. E., S. M. Hulbert; delegates to Central Body, Benjamin Brown, R. W. Mullen.

The last meeting was one of the most interesting and best attended that we have ever held, and it looks as if we are starting the new year off right. A committee was selected to make arrangements for a dance and banquet, which will be the first that we ever held. Our boys have been so busy looking after the permanent organization of the operators that they have partly overlooked the entertainments, for want of time to attend to them. But now the time has come for a little enjoyment and I think I am safe in extending an invitation to all members of the I. A. and friends to attend our first dance, which will be announced later.

Trusting that I am not intruding upon too much space in your paper and thanking you for this and all other favors you have shown for the operators, I will close with a message of cheer and best wishes for my fellow workmen through the country and pray that the News will receive the prosperity for the new year that it deserves.

Yours truly, A "NEWS" READER.

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City and unrestricted competition in the matter of inventions is good for the country at large, as witness the increase in the business of the Patent Office, amounting to over forty per cent in the last ten years. As implied in our report of last week, the receipts of the Patent Office have been far greater than any preceding year, clearly indicating the very marked prosperity of the country, since the activities in inventions and all things pertaining thereto is a sure barometer of the financial condition of the country. Furthermore this fact is a vital and convincing protest against the present tendency to "tinker" with the distinctive features of our Patent Law, in the interest of those who would curtail the inventors' well-known vested rights and prerogatives.

The failure of Congress to make adequate provision for the growing and imperative needs of the Patent Office out of the immense surplus to its credit in the U. S. Treasury, is not only demoralizing within the Office, but is also a handicap to the commercial interests of the country which is entitled to the best possible service from the Department.

ASSISTANT Commissioner Billings in a recent decision holds that it is well settled that a trade-mark cannot be assigned except in connection with the good will of a business: That an assignment of a trade-mark is not recordable which while purporting to convey the good will of the business obviously retains to the assigner a business not segregable from that attempted to be transferred: But, that an assignment of a registered trade-mark cannot be refused recordation merely because it does not transfer the good will of the business as to all the goods set up in said registration where the goods mentioned in the assignment are so different from the other goods named in the certificate that the business in the one is segregable from that in the other. Incidentally an assignment cannot be recorded nunc pro tunc.

Patent No. 1,047,508 issued to Golbert J. Dickson, of Albany, N. Y., relates more particularly to photographic shutters for use between the lenses, although adaptable to any position. The objects of the invention are to produce a photographic shutter, 1st, that will give equal exposure to all parts of the sensitive film; 2nd, that will always give the exposure for which it is set, and not be materially affected by dust or dampness; 3rd, in which the exposures are made midway between the release and stopping of the shutter which makes a revolution at each exposure, and, 4th, in which the length of the several exposures is obtained by a subdivision of the longest exposure opening the shutter will make which takes one second of time to pass the lens opening with the slowest regulated speed, which may be verified by comparison with one second of time and regulated by the exhaust valve, and in which the closing follows the opening of the shutter in the same direction. The invention consists of a rotary shutter composed of disks having an open space on one side of the center bearing of each disk and mounted on separate arbors one within the other. The inner arbor is connected with a lever arm having a coupling device, whereby the open spaces between the shutter disks may be relatively adjusted for the several exposures from the front of the outer case. The outer arbor is geared to a spring actuated operating arm having an undergearing and gearing lever and provided with detents and release catches and a stop lock for time and instantaneous exposures and connected with the plunger of a speed governor, having an adjustable exhaust valve for regulating the speed of said operating arm.

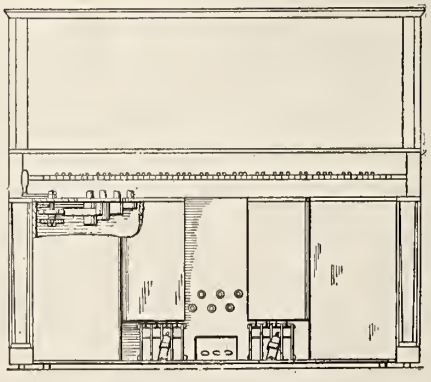
THE latest development of the "Hope-Jones Unit Orchestra" ought to render theatrical managers independent of music unions, strikes, etc., and we are informed that already nine theatres are installing the improved instrument. In this up-to-date innovation the old departments of pedal, great, swell, choir, and solo are abandoned in favor of foundation, string, woodwind, brass and percussion departments, each of which is enclosed in its own independent swell-box. By means of electro-pneumatic action, the whole organ is treated as a unit. There are no bellows, the wind being supplied by electrically driven fans and compressors, which deliver it at pressures of ten, twenty-five and fifty inches, twenty-five inches being the highest heretofore used, while that of the ordinary church organ averages only three. By means of swell shutters it is possible to control the great volume of tone produced by these pressures, so that the tuba mirabilis of fifty-inch pressure can be used to accompany a singer.

All inventors are idealists and poets, but Robert Hope Jones in addition thereto is a musical artist of renown, and an expert practical electrician to boot—that is in the "over and above" sense—in no wise referring to the reflex action of the human knee joint. While he is unquestionably exempt from such a literal translation of the term, that is more than can be said for the artistic abilities of the average duplex orchestra (?) of the "movies,"—the drummer particularly provoking the audience to the "kicking" point when even mediocre films fail to do so.

Norman John Norman, of London, England, has been granted registration No. 89,766 for "BIOFIX" as a trade-mark for Apparatus for the Reproduction of Moving and Still Pictures, used since July, 1911.

"What's in a name?"

Nothwithstanding his peaceful cognomen, the defendant in State v. DOVE (156 N. Car. 653) killed his antagonist after a long and hard fight.



Patent No. 1,047,090 issued to Samuel Lapin, of Philadelphia, Pa., is for Improvements in Stage-Noise Cabinets especially adapted to the requirements of the motion picture show, being capable of application to an upright piano so that the player thereof can actuate and control the various sound effects appropriate to the film projection. Provision is made for the imitation of the sounds of various musical instruments, castanets, animals, the cry of a baby, the neighing of a donkey, a wood crash, a siren, a steamboat whistle, etc., including the use of electric drum and bells, telegraph sounder, the gong of a police patrol or fire engine, sword clashing, sleigh bells, horse trotting or running, the starting of a locomotive, and so on, all under control of the pianist. The latter thus becomes the orchestral factotum, eliminating the versatile "drummer" of the ordinary dual orchestra. Presumably this is the line of economy—certainly it will enable the audience to concentrate its cusses. And in case of a "strike" the orchestra can rise up and walk out as one man.

"Plaintiffs go into court voluntarily; defendants are pulled in by the ears." (Judge Lamm, 135 Southwestern Reporter 39.)

It is now conceded to be axiomatic that the field of usefulness of the motion-picture art is practically unlimited, and the following excerpt from a letter from Bordeaux reveals a cynical confirmation of the fact. "Amusement creators, scientists and instructors have demonstrated the value of the motion picture, but a company of knaves in this city were the first to use the art for criminal purposes. According to the report, an automobile halted near the residence of a bank director in a suburb of that city and six men began to act a burglary before a moving picture instrument. Two of the actors (?) were dressed as policemen, and when the burglary had been accomplished they valiantly captured the malefactors. The man who worked the machine and the rest of the party then entered the automobile, thanked the real policeman, who had kept the curious people out of the picture, and rode away. Later it was discovered that jewelry to the value of 15,000 francs had been stolen from the temporarily vacant house, none of which has been recovered."

"God bless the man who first invented sleep!"
So Sancho Panza said and so say I;
And bless him, also, that he didn't keep
His great discovery to himself, nor try
To make it—as the lucky fellow might—
A close monopoly by Patent Right."

SHERIDAN'S RIDE
(3 Reel "101" Bison)

An exhibition was given for the benefit of the press in the projection room of the Universal Film Company on Friday last, of a splendidly produced film entitled "Sheridan's Ride." "101" Bison is suggestive to the public of fine spectacular presentation, and it is with pleasure that we give to our readers a brief commentary on this altogether splendid historic production.

The usual love story is of course interwoven with the incidents attendant on the great historic events of the Civil War, upon which this film presentation is founded

General Phil Sheridan, who made the famous twenty-mile dash in two hours to save the day for the Union Army, meets Miss Rebecca Wright, and a friendship is formed which is destined to be lasting.

George Briarson, an orphan nephew of Miss Wright, and brought up by her, is in love with a Southern beauty, Caroline Ashburn.

The old house is gaily decorated to celebrate the return of George, much to the disgust of Clem Shelby, a rival suitor. George is given a warm-hearted reception. The first gun in the Civil War is fired, and the news spreads like wildfire. Clem is an ardent Southerner, but in front of the town hall, George publicly announces his Union proclivities. Blows are struck, and a duel is arranged between Clem and George.

George steals out in the morning and is seen by Caroline. She sees the rapier and divines its import. She follows, and is a witness to the duel, in which the hot-headed attack of Clem is met by the cooler George, who wounds his adversary and erstwhile friend.

George receives a dispatch from his old friend, Phil Sheridan, telling him to "come and get that promised commission." He goes, leaving a proud aunt and a sorrowing girl behind him.

Incidents in the war followed hot and fast, and one engagement succeeds another. One day, old darkey Ephraim is admitted through the lines. He is selling vegetables. Sheridan sends the old man with a secret message to Rebecca Wright. The note is written on tissue, and covered with tinfoil, which Uncle Eph puts in his mouth. In it Sheridan asks for the disposition of the Rebel troops. Miss Wright gives him the information required.

Sheridan sends out troops to check the enemy's advance. He is roused from a hurried sleep by bad news. He hurries out and finds his troopers retreating in disorder, despite the frantic efforts of George and other officers.

Sheridan's bravery and personality turn the adverse tide. He rallies the men, inflames them, rides back, recaptures the guns, and puts the enemy to rout. During the battle the old enemies, George and Clem, meet in a sabre duel. George is wounded, and Clem is killed by the bursting of a shell.

George is nursed to health by Caroline, and happiness comes with the return of peace. George receives a letter from Sheridan, announcing that his commission of Captain awaits him.

There are many occurrences of recent happening that point to the progress of the art of motion picture making. The many dignities that are being accorded it should make the hearts of film men pulse with pride. The Boston Traveler and Evening Herald give us the following interesting bit:

"Assistant Superintendent John J. Mahoney, director of the Cambridge evening schools, told the Public School Association in the Cambridge Latin School Hall last evening that he was going to introduce Edison's educational films at the Kelley School, East Cambridge, after the Christmas holidays for the purpose of reaching the illiterate foreign population. It will be the first trial of the new method of teaching, evolved by the famous inventor, in this part of the country."

A large tract of land has been purchased by President S. S. Hutchinson for the American Film Manufacturing Company at Santa Barbara, Cal., and local architects are designing extensive improvements, which will be ready for Mr. Hutchinson's approval next January, when he will again visit California to supervise the improvements.

The entire tract will be made beautiful and artistic. There will be nothing ramshackle about the place. Eight or ten buildings, artistically grouped in settings of lawns and flower beds, will constitute the studio and laboratories of the several companies now engaged in the production of the "Flying A" plays. The American Company intends to make this a model and the finest of its kind in the country.

VITAGRAPH

MA'S APRON STRINGS (Jan. 21).—When her son Ernie has reached the age of 21, Ma Smith cannot realize that he has attained his manhood or has any right to think for himself. He is their only child and the apple of her eye. She had kept him so entirely under her care and attention that he has almost lost the power of thinking for himself. In fact, she has never given him that privilege. He is tied so tightly to her apron strings the poor fellow can hardly get away from her. She will not let him stay out after eight o'clock at night, always takes him to prayer meeting and church festivals, and even then is afraid some girl may steal him. Molly, the granddaughter of Mr. and Mrs. Bush, comes to live with them and Ernie meets her at her grandfather's store, where they become acquainted. This is the beginning of his breaking away from Ma's apron strings. He has a rival, but Molly rather favors Ernie, and, one evening, accepts his escort home from prayer meeting, leaving his rival very much dejected. Ma Smith, when she is ready to leave the meeting house for home, looks for her boy. She cannot find him and becomes alarmed.

Hastening home and not finding him there, she raises an alarm and starts out with a searching party. Pretty nigh onto midnight she decides to inquire at the Bush's if they have seen anything of Ernie. Here she learns that he is spending the evening with Molly. Going into the parlor with Mrs. Bush, Ma and Pa Smith behold Ernie embracing Molly and making love to her.

Ma begins to wail when she thinks of her boy being under the influence of anybody else but herself. Pa is delighted and says: "By Heck, I am glad to see him acting like a man!" Stepping forward, Mrs. Bush looking on smilingly, he blesses the two youngsters and rejoices in the awakening of his son's independence.

KINEMACOLOR

THE STRUGGLE, By Robert Kloeber.—A powerful story, teaching a strong lesson. Tom is hurt in a football accident. The doctor uses hypodermic injections of morphine, and Tom becomes a morphine fiend. He manages to keep his secret hidden from his friends. He goes home with Bob for the holidays. At the ranch he meets Bob's sister Helen. They love and Tom is accepted. Now his fight against the drug continues; even his love for Helen cannot overcome the cravings for morphine. Bob surprises him in the act of using the hypodermic and demands an explanation. Tom confesses his inability to stop the drug and sinks upon the bed overcome with shame. Bob determines upon a cure. Here comes some wonderful gripping scenes, where the two boys wander on the desert until Tom sinks, overcome. Bob determines to put him to the test. He has pretended to lose the trail; now he leads Tom to the sut of an old miner. They prepare to sleep in the attic. Bob slips the hypodermic where Tom can see it. For a moment there is a struggle but love wins and Tom throws the fatal instrument out of the window. Bob keeps the secret, and on their return home places his sister in Tom's arms.

EDISON

THE AMBASSADOR'S DAUGHTER (Jan. 21).—Richard Farnsworth, an attache at the U. S. Embassy in London, is in love with Helen, the ambassador's daughter, and we see her at the embassy ball refuse his proposal of marriage.

The next day while the ambassador is at work in his office a letter containing an important document is received. This he slips under the blotting pad on his desk and goes out with Helen. A clerk in the embassy, Charles Dumont, who is really a spy in the hire of a foreign power, has seen the ambassador hide the document and, during the latter's absence, avails himself of the opportunity to steal it, but hearing somebody coming, he slips it into a vase and returns to his office unseen. Meantime Farnsworth, entering the ambassador's office, finds on the floor a glove which Helen has dropped. He acts rather foolish over it, kisses it and is just putting it in his pocket, close to his heart, when the ambassador returns with Helen. The ambassador goes to his desk and discovers that the document is gone. He questions Crompton and Dumont, but to no avail, and, finally, turning to Farnsworth asks him what he had placed in his pocket. He becomes foolishly embarrassed but refuses to tell, and Helen, divining he has her glove, throws her father off the scent by suggesting that he make a thorough search before accusing anyone. This they proceed to do, and Dumont, taking advantage of the opportunity, takes the document from its hiding place and hurries from the room. Helen becomes suspicious of him and follows him unobserved.

Of course the search of the desk proves unavailing and the ambassador again turns to Farnsworth for explanation. Realizing the seriousness of his silence he shows the glove and explains the reason for his embarrassment. The ambassador understands, but just then Crompton enters, telling them of the disappearance of Dumont. Farnsworth, eager for action, hurries out to see if he can get on his track.

Meantime Dumont, followed by Helen, had gone to an Italian restaurant to turn over the document to two European spies. She manages to get into the courtyard of the restaurant outside the open window at which the spies are sitting. She watches her chance and, unobserved, takes the document from the table. But the gate by which she had expected to escape from the courtyard proves to be locked and she is caught. Farnsworth arrives in time to rescue her; having seen Dumont come out of the restaurant he rightly assumes that he will find her.

Dumont returns to the embassy, unaware of what has taken place in the restaurant. He is closely questioned by the ambassador and Crompton, but holds his own until Helen and Farnsworth arrive with the document and their story of his guilt. He is arrested and Helen discovers that she does love Farnsworth after all.

AMERICAN

WHERE DESTINY GUIDES (Jan. 20).—Virgie's father was brought home from the mine mortally wounded. Before dying he asked that, for protection's sake, Dick Connors marry his daughter. The marriage was solemnized in a daze, neither having known the other. After it is all over, Virgie, overcome with grief, leaped upon her horse and galloped away into the mountains. She was picked up by Ranchman Lee and his wife in a semi-conscious condition, her memory gone. They adopt her and she grew up with them.

A Mexican foreman working for Lee made violent love to her. Virgie resented it and he followed her often, pleading his lost cause. Then Dick called at the ranch and learned for the first time what had become of his wife and of her sad plight. She did not recognize her husband until after a violent encounter of Dick with the Mexican, during which she received a blow on the head, the shock of which brought back her reason.

The timely interference of Lee saved Dick and caused the banishment of the Mexican. Dick and Virgie then take up life where a seemingly unkind fate broke the thread.

THE SILVERPLATED GUN (Jan. 23).—Avenged, the outlaw took his way into the mountains. The sheriff followed. Hour after hour the hunt went on, from hill to valley, from the open to the woods. Both struggled against exhaustion, leaned frequently against some boulder to regain their breath and wits. Slipping from one rock to the other, the bandit ever eluded search and ever the sheriff followed. When human strength could stand no longer, the bandit sank down, his silverplated gun glistening in the sun. And then the miracle happened. The reflection of the sun on the silverplated gun shone straight into the tired eyes of the sheriff. He looked up, followed the glistening light, and, with gun in hand, bagged his exhausted fugitive. With gun before him the sheriff followed the bandit into town.

THE OLD OAKEN BUCKET (Jan. 23).—The "Old Oaken Bucket" hangs in the famous well on the Woodworth farm at Scituate, Mass. Ellen, "the Pride of the Valley," brings a letter for Samuel Woodworth. It calls him away to fame and fortune—within the heart of the great city. Sam rejoices; Ellen weeps. In Boston, Sam drifts downward with fast companions, and takes to imbibing liquor that never saw the stone walls of a well. He neglects to write to his home and mother. A year elapses. Ellen goes to the city in search of her absent lover. She is present, unknown to the participants, at a game of cards and sees Sam gambling with Big Bill and "Dandy" Dick. Much liquor is indulged in. Sam becomes intoxicated. He accuses Bill of cheating. Sam, then under the influence of liquor, draws a pistol. Bill gets possession of the weapon. Dick interferes to protect the life of his friend Sam and is shot dead by the now infuriated Bill. When the big gambler realizes what he has done, he boldly calls in witnesses and places all blame upon the drunken shoulders of the almost insensible Sam. In court Sam is convicted of the crime, but Ellen timely comes to the rescue, reveals what she saw unknown to the others, and saves her lover from the gallows and disgrace. They return to the old farm and the neglected mother, and Sam ance more drinks from "The Old Oaken Bucket."

CINES—GEORGE KLEINE

SHE SHALL NOT KNOW (Jan. 21).—Soon after the death of her father, Amy is informed by the family lawyer that no money will remain when the estate is settled. This news fills the home with gloom and apprehension, intensified by the fact that the prostrated mother cannot possibly endure the shock that certainly would follow cognizance of the true state of affairs.

That misfortunes usually come when least prepared for proves true in this instance. Even before the mother is completely recovered, Fred Hampton asks for her consent to his marriage with Amy. In the presence of her lover Amy is informed by her mother that the amount of the dowry has been arranged. Momentarily she muses. Then her countenance becomes flushed with embarrassment, and, bursting into tears, she rushes from the room, to the great surprise of her mother and her sweetheart.

In her breast rages a battle between love and duty. She loves Fred with all sincerity, but her mother must not know that there is no money with which to make up the dowry. Only one thing remains to be done: she resolves to sacrifice her own happiness for the sake of her mother. She painfully writes Fred a letter explaining that she can never love him, and that their marriage is impossible.

Her mother shall never know!

URBAN ECLIPSE—GEORGE KLEINE

JUST MISSED HIM (Jan. 22).—Sam Slick is an extremely slippery fellow, and leads his pursuers a long and arduous chase. They first stealthily attempt to surprise him in his room, but just when they are most certain of capturing him, he manages to wriggle out from their grasp. The minions of the law are persistent, and at last their efforts meet with success. Wishing to take no chances, they carefully place him in a cell and fasten the bars, but later the sly fellow even makes his escape from there in a most extraordinary manner.

On the same reel:

THE MANCHESTER SHIP CANAL (ENGLAND).—We are taken upon an interesting trip along this busy ship canal from Eastham to Manchester, during which we are shown many flourishing towns along the way and several marvelous feats of engineering.

FRONTIER

THE WILD FLOWER OF PINO MOUNTAIN (Jan. 29).—There are many men in this world of splendid ability and strength of character who have succeeded in amassing fortunes, and while success is theirs they are strong and steady, but when reverses come they can stoop to a cowardly act much more quickly than the mediocre or common man, as is the case in our little story.

James Anthony had amassed a fortune, then came reverses, and the loss of his splendid wife, who was his real mainstay, and we find in our opening scene a man crushed beyond apparent redemption, and in a moment of frenzy he takes a revolver from the drawer, is about to end his life, when his baby girl toucbes him and says, "Papa, please kiss baby." The shock brings him to his senses. The gun is thrown far from him. He folds the baby to his breast, caresses and fondles it, while the tears roll down his cheeks. The baby has saved the father, but he decides that he cannot stay amid scenes that are constantly bringing up recollection of happier days. He decides to take his baby and leave the community, never to return.

One year passes by. We next see him living with bis baby girl in a cave in the Pino Mountain. Years pass. John Baker and Leon Noble, two young, healthy, happy backswoodsmen, go out for their day's work of woodchopping, and are busily employed when they are interrupted by a young woman running toward them. She explains that her father is dying, and asks them to come with her, which tbey immediately do. The scene shifts to the cave in the mountains wbere, twelve years ago, James Anthony had made a rough home to escape civilization. We find Anthony dying, the mere shadow of his former self, worn away by the memories of happier and prosperous days that had continued always to haunt his every thought. Before dying, he begs the woodchoppers to care for his little daughter and see that she was taken back to civilization and properly cared for, and then his tired spirit passes to that great beyond, from which no traveler ever returns.

The young girl is taken to their cabin and is given every care and attention. Days pass by, and both men find that they have learned to love the little orpban, whom they nicknamed "Wild Flower," and while they feel they should obey the father's request, they find it hard to part from her, and she lingers there until one day John Baker, finding her sitting alone in front of their little cabin, tells her of his great love for her, and asks her if she will marry him. She tells him she cannot marry him because she does not love him, nor does she love anyone; that she cares just as much for Leon as she does for him, and that the thought of marriage never entered her mind. John leaves her, thinking that later on she will repent, but when only a few days later he finds Leon asking her the same question, he decides that but one of tbem can be successful. The next morning they start out for their work. John asks Leon if he loves Wild Flower. Leon answers yes, and they decide that tbey will fight for her love. They prepare for the struggle. The scene shifts to Wild Flower. She has a presentiment that something is wrong, gets hurriedly up, and goes out of the picture in the direction taken by the men. We go back to the men, and they are fighting with the strength grown of frenzy. Wild Flower comes into view, sees the men fighting, rushes up and in between them. A rosary worn by John has been torn from his neck in the scuffle and lies upon the rocks at their feet. Wild Flower picks it up and holds it before her, and to their view, and demands that they cease their quarreling, that she cannot love either of them, and that she is going back to civilization—back to the holy sisters that her dead father had told her about so many times, who will care for her—that she must go out of their lives, and then they can be good friends as they were before she came. She turns and vanishes. They both watch her out of sight, humbled and repentant, with all the anger gone from their hearts. The scene now shifts to a convent. Wild Flower comes up to the gate, a sister bids her enter. She steps through the gateway into the fold.

CRYSTAL

WITH HER RIVAL'S HELP (Feb. 2).—Nellie, the country girl, is very much in love with Chester. He seems to like her until Nellie Thomas is employed by the other Nellie's people as housemaid. He transfers his affections, and when Nellie's father catches him kissing Miss Thomas he orders him from the place. Chester then writes a letter to Miss Thomas asking her to meet him at the minister's and they will be married. He gives the letter to "Stupid" Sam to deliver and "Stupid" gives it to the wrong Nellie. She reads it and in her haste to make the minister's home on time drops it. The real Nellie whom the letter was intended for, finds it, and decides to go and meet Chester herself. She goes on horseback and the other Nellie goes in the family runabout. Nellie's horse goes lame and, meeting the other Nellie on the road, is invited by her to attend her wedding and invites Nellie to ride in the runabout. This she does, and they both meet Chester. He quickly shows where his love lies, and the hired girl is married to him while her namesake and rival goes home in chagrin.

On the same reel:

BOX AND COX.—Box is a printer. He works all night. Cox is a hatter. He works all day. Box rents a room from Mrs. Bouncer, a lodging house keeper, telling her he will only use it in the daytime. Cox visits Mrs. Bouncer and asks for a room, telling her he will use it only at night. She rents the same room to the both of them. Then starts a strange series of situations. Mrs. B. must get Cox out of bed before Box comes home, and Box out of bed before Cox comes home. She uses all sorts of subterfuges to keep Box downstairs in the dining-room while Tillie, the housemaid, chases Cox out of the house and then straightens up the room. This works for a while until one day Cox oversleeps and Mrs. B., thinking he has gone, allows Box to go upstairs. He tumbles into bed and is surprised to find it occupied. A fight follows and Box kicks Cox downstairs. He complains to Mrs. B. and, going upstairs with Cox, confesses that she had rented the room to the both of them. Box, who up to this moment had not noticed Cox, recognizes in him an old acquaintance and, renewing all old ties, they agree to share the room together.

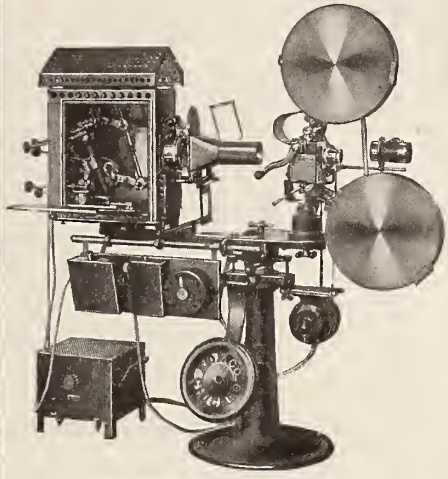
THE PROOF—WE CANNOT EXCEED DEMAND



1913 Motor-Drive Motiograph

Every factory begins its year by estimating its output and hopes to exceed the estimate. Few do.

Every manufacturer endeavors to get ahead a few machines—We cannot—The orders come in so fast we can just "break even"—Orders vs. shipments.

Our orders have exceeded our estimate 20%.

Our force has worked overtime for three months to enable us to "hold our own".

YES—AS USUAL—WE ORIGINATED THE MACHINE SWITCH-BOARD.

YES—IT IS BEING COPIED—WITH MODIFICATIONS—BUT ON A MUCH CHEAPER SCALE.

OUR QUALITY IS NEVER COPIED—WHY?

HOW HE WON HER (Jan. 29).—Jake and Sue are very much in love, but old Silas, Sue's father, is a grouchy old curmudgeon, and objects to Jake as he would object to anything or anybody of a pleasant nature. He spends quite a lot of energy in chasing Jake off the lot.

"One Round" Casey arrives in town. Casey is always spoiling for a scrap. The very person for a nice, disagreeable son-in-law, says Silas. Sue is pretty and Casey is willing. Jake objects, and gets his eye variegated. Jake puts up a good, stiff fight, but is eventually unable to respond to the call of time. Backed up by Silas, Casey promises Jake a licking every time he calls, so Jake does not call, but he broods and awaits his chance to get even. The chance comes by one of nature's freaks.

Jake makes a last appeal and Silas, thinking it a good joke, tells Jake that for every foot he can make Casey run, he may spend an evening in the parlor with Sue.

On a lovely night, when the moon is softly shining, Casey persuades the lovely Sue to take a drive. Jake retires early, and the worrying brings on an old habit—he walks in his sleep, gracefully attired in a plain but serviceable nightie.

Casey and Sue pass the cemetery when a white figure appears in the moonlight. The horse stops dead, Casey gives a look and one jump, and leaves Sue transfixed with terror as the ghost comes nearer and nearer, until it bumps into the horse and wakes up—it is Jake! Sue throws down a carriage rug to him, and together they drive to a friendly minister, who lends Jake some clothes and marries them. Jake figures it out that he saw Casey two miles away, and for every foot he ran he was entitled to an evening in the parlor with Sue, and as the allotted evenings were many, why not spend them in their own parlor?

The following morning Casey appears, having covered nine miles. He describes the terrible fight he had with the ghost, but Sue put the old man wise, and Casey is banished and Jake forgiven.

REX

THE LABYRINTH (Feb. 2).—Polowsky, a Pole of the intellectual class, arrives in America, together with his wife and Rachel, his little girl. He finds it hard to get work and the little family are getting to the hungry stage when Polowsky gets employment as a railroad laborer, but they are all grieved when they learn that Polowsky must leave them.

Polowsky endeavors to get an advance of wages to send his wife, but the boss will not hear of it. The wife and child are turned out by the landlord, and Mrs. Polowsky, fainting in the street, is picked up by Mr. and Mrs. Weston, who takes her to the hospital. She dies, and the Westons adopt Rachel. Polowsky returns, and has a fruitless search for his child.

Years pass. Polowsky becomes a peddler. He calls at the house of George Scott, the Forest Ranger, and whilst showing his goods Rachel comes up with Cartwright, who is paying his attentions to Rachel, and the Westons, in an auto. Polowsky sees Rachel make a familiar motion with her hand to her hair. He recognizes the gesture, and asks Scott where the girl lives. Scott gives him the direction, and he arrives at the Weston mansion. He shows his wares, and is ridiculed by Cartwright and the ladies. He is about to go, when Rachel comes from the house and pities him. She runs after him to offer him some money, when an auto speeds around the curve and, in saving the girl, Polowsky is struck and injured. They carry him into the house. He convalesces, and, in a series of conversations he has with Rachel, knows her to be his daughter.

A hunting trip is arranged and all the guests attend it. The party divides up, and Cartwright unintentionally shoots Rachel. Scott is horrified. They pick the girl up and carry her home. The sight is too much for Polowsky, who tells them he is her father. When she recovers, Polowsky has the pleasure of seeing her united to George Scott.

NESTOR

THE FOOTPATH TO HAPPINESS (Jan. 27).—A comedy in feet—and not many feet at that. A dainty pair of tootsies are in the park. They are tripping, twinkling feet. Therefore, the owner of them is young and happy.

A pair of well shod feet follow after. The steps are firm and springy—some nice young fellow, without a doubt.

The two pairs of feet meet, a handkerchief drops, a man's hand reaches down. We see it all! A designing young person and a boy—he'll win hands down.

This scene looks suspiciously like an ice cream parlor. The pedal extremities meet, they part and depart. Steps of stone (not flesh). The feminine booties ascend, the masculine ones have a regretful appearance—one foot sounds taps!

Ha! An altar, dainty white satin shoes, and patent leathers. We thought this would come. Another pair of feet this time, square with a clerical gown skirting them.

And last of all, but the beginning of all, eight legs, four of them belonging to a new table, two of them in sweet little slippers, and two in "go-to-the-office" shoes, very nicely polished. We wish them luck.

THE BOSS OF THE RANCH (Jan. 30).—Rancher Price having been killed by falling from his horse, his daughter Nora assumes charge of the ranch. Her foreman, Ben Lane, would like to boss the ranch as well as win Nora's heart, but Nora decides she will run the ranch herself.

Steve Gibbs, the son of one of her father's friends, comes to the ranch and is given a position, much to the distress of Ben, who sees in him a rival. Now, on the side, Ben is the leader of a band of cattle rustlers and steals cattle from Nora's ranch. Steve, being a newcomer, is accused of the crime, but Nora protects him from the wrath of the punchers.

Indignant at being accused, Steve leaves the ranch and accidentally stumbles on the rustlers' camp. By a clever trick he is able to round up the whole band, and for his cleverness is appointed the boss of the ranch.

MEMORIES (Feb. 6).—An old lady, left at home alone, dozes off by the fireplace, and in her dreams recalls all the scenes of her life. Her girlhood home and young lover; their wooing and elopement; their crossing the prairie to establish a home in the West; building the little cabin; the birth of their only son; the death of the father in an Indian raid; the growth of the boy and subsequent wedding to his employer's daughter, whereby he gains an interest in the business; the son's success in making the old mother comfortable; then her awakening from the reverie by the return of the son and his wife from a picture show.

IMP

GOLD IS NOT ALL, by Wilfred Lucas (2-reel) (Jan, 30).—The great opera singer, against the advice of her physician, insists on singing one more performance, to earn enough to complete the trust fund she is desirous of setting aside for her child. The effort is too much, and she dies upon the stage. Her brother, who has been left guardian of the child, is crazed by the, to him, immense sum of money in his hands, and hides himself with the child and the money in a tenement, where the child is kept a virtual prisoner. The miser spends his days in gloating over the stolen money. After twelve years, three Bohemian friends rent the studio immediately above, and the imprisoned heiress, through the ministrations of the tenement slavey, meets Karl, the pianist. The miser about this time falls asleep after counting his treasure, and leaves a lighted candle, which sets fire to the room. Trying to reach the concealed fortune, he is burned to death. Karl, seeing the smoke, gallantly rescues the girl, who, alone in the world, by the death of her uncle, is adopted by the three friends.

Later, Karl discovers the girl has a wonderful voice, and sets himself to develop it, his influence gaining the hearing of a rich man, who in turn brings the great impresario, who personally coaches her until she is ready for her debut.

The evening of her first appearance she insists on making the supper for the boys, and in an alcohol lamp explosion Karl, rescuing her from danger, burns his hand so badly that he can never play the piano again. After her triumph, at a studio gathering, the rich man, intoxicated, forces his attentions on the girl, and she running to her own room for safety, is followed by Karl, who saves her once more, and in the struggle the hidden treasure is brought to light.

The rich man is paid back for his expenditures, and Karl and the girl are placed beyond the reach of want.

PUNCH

THEIR FIRST BABY (Jan. 30).—May and Dick, a young couple, have a baby whom they think a wonder. They decide to relieve the maid for once and take their child out for the first time. Dick puts it into its pram and off they start. Along the avenue they regard everyone to see if the baby is receiving proper admiration. And when they meet a friend, Dick's pride in his son knows no bounds. They stop before a shop—May has some things to buy. Will hubby watch baby for a while? Certainly, hubby will be glad to do so. So, May goes into the shop. Left alone with Dad, the child commences to weep. Dick looks into the window—but May is still at the glove counter and he can catch no glimpse of her. The baby's roars increase. Dick is in despair. He goes to the door of the shop, but returns at an extra loud roar from baby. Afraid lest the baby die on his hands, he grabs him out of the carriage and starts on a run to the doctor. An interfering gossip sees this—and thinks Dick is a kidnapper. The follows and informs a boob cop, who has nothing else to do, and he is put under arrest. Despite his protests Dick is dragged to the station house. Meantime May has come out of the store to find baby and husband missing. She nearly faints. Is attended by some ladies. She calls up the station and is told her baby is safe, but the bold bad kidnapper is secure in a cell. Followed by the ladies, May hurries to the station, where the baby is placed in her arms. The ladies demand to see the kidnapper. Poor Dick is dragged out of his cell and at once all the ladies angrily fall upon him tooth and nail. May, happening to look up a second from the haby, sees who it is, and rushes to his defence. This is my husband. Dick is released and the pair start off with their baby, while the captain rates the boop cop, and the ladies look at one another in disgust because there was no scandal in town after all.

On the same reel.

THAT CATCHY RAGTIME DANCE.—Jim brings a piece of popular ragtime music down home to the village, and while walking afong the street with his sweetheart Sue, he teaches her the song, witb the result that both are soon swaying to the syncopated melody. A group of old maids see them and recognize the much talked of "turkey trot." They rush to tbe sheriff and have the young pair arrested for dancing on the street.

The case comes up for trial and Jim's lawyer, who has sent to the city for numerous copies of the song, distribute them to the judge and jury. Then he calls in a band of colored banjo players and they strum the popular melody so feelingly that judge, jury and spectators are all soon dancing to the strains. The jury "turkey trots" out and returns very soon in like fashion to render a verdict of "not guilty," and this verdict is echoed by all in the courtroom.

MAJESTIC

HARRY'S LESSON (Jan. 19).—Harry, a lazy, good-looking chap, is the idol of his mother's heart. She pets and pampers him until his father is disgusted. Harry works in his dad's office, that is to say, he spends a few hours there every day. When the girls are all wild about Harry and when a crowd of them arrive for tea, they insist that mother call up the office and have Harry sent home. Father is furious, but obeying the habit of years, he sends the boy home to be adored and fussed over by the ladies. And the greatest adorer of all is Harry's mother. Then, one day, Isabel comes to pay them a visit. She is full of life and energy, and Harry's languid ways amuses her. When he tries to flirt with her she chases him upstairs for her gloves and puts him very properly in his place.

Finding her a great novelty, as she refuses to adore him, he falls in love with her and proposes. Realizing she can make something out of the insolent boy, she accepts him, providing that he earn a living for them both and remain no longer dependent upon his father. Harry promises and they are married. Then all is very different. Harry rises at seven and prepares the breakfast coffee for Isab.el. After breakfast he goes to the office in the cars, for taxis are now a thing unknown. At the office he works as hard as any clerk to please his father and to please Isabel. He cooks the meals and does all the work, but through it all he is happier than ever before. His mother moans a bit over her boy's fate, but is forced to see the improvement in him. After a talk with father, Isabel hires a maid. Then, for the first time, she attends a bit to her husband's comfort. For she knows he has learned his lesson and that things will all run smoothly.

THE CABBY AND THE DEMON (Jan. 21).—Jack and his sweetheart Mabel receive invitations to a masque ball. Mabel decides to dress in Pierrott's costume. Jack, to surprise Mabel, decides upon a novel and unusual make-up—getting his idea from a hansom cabby whom he hails to take him home. The night of the ball Mabel is escorted by a friend masqued as Mephisto, for Jack has been detained at the office. Jack arrives made up exactly as the cabby, who arrives later with another Mephisto, who having imbibed freely, refuses to pay cabby his fare. Cabby follows the Mephisto into the ballroom, and various complications occur because of the fact that two cabbies and two Mephistos are present at the festivities.

RELIANCE

THE OPEN ROAD (Jan. 22).—Tom, the son of a millionaire, marries Gladys de Vere, a chorus girl. His father hearing of this, disowns the boy. Learning that her husband will be penniless, Gladys soon leaves him. Tom, cast off by father and wife, has nowhere to go and listens to the lure of the open road. Answering its call he becomes a tramp. Before long the constant walking in the bracing air makes a new man out of the dissipated youth. He gets a new lease on life and finds the open road productive of much that is good. He meets a traveling "Uncle Tom" show and they give him a job pasting billboards. He falls in love with Linette, a pretty actress, thereby incurring the enmity of Joe Briggs, an actor. Joe and Tom come to blows, and in this fight Tom discovers the good that the open road worked in his heretofore feeble muscles, but he knocks the actor out with no difficulty at all, thus winning the right to pay court to Linette. But as Tom looks into the trusting face of the girl whom he knows returns his love, he remembers the other woman to whom he gave his name, and he knows he has no right to make love to this girl.

A detective, hired by Tom's father, follows the show and tells the boy that his father wants him back. When Tom asks for Gladys he hears that sbe was never really his wife as she had a husband living when she married him. Tom, in delight at his freedom, rushes to Linette and wins her consent to their immediate marriage. But when his father learns that his son has again married an actress, he refuses to receive him. Tom and Linette come to the city hoping to get work, and while there, read in the papers that the old man is very ill and that only the transfusion of blood from some healthy man can save him. Tom volunteers and readily passes the doctor's examination. His father is saved, and when Tom is wheeled in and the old man hears the truth, he becomes reconciled to his son and to Linette.

THE MASQUERADERS (Jan. 25).—Harry Parson, temporarily embarrassed by some bad stock speculations, loves rich Dolly Gray, and hates the sheriff and a bunch of subpœna servers who are on his trail. Dolly is made miserable by an impetuous French fortune hunter, Count Briebert, whose suit is favored by Dolly's mother. Mrs. Gray, to clinch the title, invites him to a dance that night, to which Harry is invited by Dolly's brother Dan. Harry is almost captured by the creditors and the sheriff, who surround the house where the party is given. To escape arrest, he conceives the idea of masquerading in some of Dolly's clothes. Dan, her brother, thinks it is a great lark, and helps him dress. Dolly, so annoyed by the attentions of the Count Briebert, asks her brother Dan for advice. He has just finished with Harry's toilet, and he suggests that the girl dress up in some clothes, which he can produce, as a boy, attend the dance at the Country Club that night, and play a trick on the count. Dolly agrees without telling Harry of the stunt. Dan takes his friend's dress suit and slips it to his sister. When they all leave the house for the dance that night, Mrs. Gray misses Dolly, but Dan tells her he will bring her. Dan takes Harry, dressed in girl's clothes, to the dance, where he is introduced as a visitor, and makes an immense impression with the other fellows. Dan returns for his sister and, as he is taking her down to the taxicab, she is arrested by the sheriff for debt, etc. Her pockets are searched and show the card case and some letters of Harry Parson's, and the sheriff thinks his proof is perfect. Before he can search further, Dan manages to get him into the auto, ties his hands, and they steal the sheriff, hurry to the dance and get on the inside. The sheriff is seen later working his way loose (in flash) and escaping from the stable where he has been imprisoned. He sneaks out for assistance. At the dance the pretended boy has great fun with the count, insults him, challenges him and fights a duel, proving that the count is a coward and a sneak. Meanwhile Harry is raising old nick with his pretended femininity and shocks the girls by dancing turkey trots and smoking cigarettes as he waltzes. The count tries to make love to him and he is "walloped" by Harry just as Dolly comes in and recognizes the supposed girl, and then tells about the adventure with the sheriff. While the dance is going on, and complications setting in, Harry's lawyer follows to the Country Club to bring him the settlement due him, to square his finances. He is happy now, but in order to have some fun, proposes that they elope then and there and surprise the old folks. Dolly agrees, and they climb into a racing car, whiz to the minister and are married in their costumes, to the minister's bewilderment. There they change clothes in a comic situation. Hurrying back to the dance they are surrounded by the sheriff and his men. Walking out on the dance floor, where the sheriff and a posse are holding every one up at the pistol point, Harry pays his debts, proves his identity, and tells the joke; the sheriff calls off his posse and everyone is happy except the count, when the marriage is announced.

GREAT NORTHERN

JOHN STEALS A FURLOUGH.—John is an enlisted soldier and is such in name only. The dull routine of life in the barracks gets on his nerves and his thoughts revert to the old home life and the sweetheart tbat he had left behind when he was obliged to enter the service of his country. While he is brooding over his sad fate he receives a note from his lady love informing him that she has arrived in town and will meet him in a music hall and summer garden close to the harracks. John is elated to such an extent that he fails to communicate with the lieutenant, who is his immediate superior, and he proceeds to leave the barracks through a window after the other soldiers have retired to slumber. The lieutenant, however, is also an admirer of John's sweetheart and follows him to the place of meeting. The dear girl and John are having a most enjoyable time over tbeir steins when the lieutenant is espied in the offing. John makes a hasty disappearance under the table at which he has been seated, and the lieutenant takes the chair that he had been occupying a few moments before. John is obliged to be an unwilling listener to the love-making of the lieutenant, and finally, in desperation, he decides to go back to the barracks. The lieutenant again trails him and places him under arrest on a charge of desertion. John is placed in a cell and is having visions of life imprisonment when his sweetheart enters the office of the lieutenant and demands that John be released, otherwise she will inform the colonel of the former's visit to the summer garden. The latter is obliged, for self-protection, to release the valiant John, and the latter is granted a furlough for a few hours, instead of being obliged to steal it.

LUX

THE MAGIC CARPET (Jan. 24).—James is shaking the drawing-room carpet upon the heads of the passersby, who make a violent objection to this treatment. Seizing the carpet they pull James, carpet and all, out of the window. Upon touching the ground, the carpet becomes bewitched, and James is borne upon it, to the consternation of all beholders, who proceed to follow the carpet. A very mad chase is the result.

On the same reel.—DETECTIVE KNOW-ALL ON THE TRAIL.

FAINT HEART NEVER WON FAIR LADY (Jan. 31).—A young man about town decides that a fond wife would be a great acquisition, but the point that troubles him is whom to marry. Finding himself face to face with this matrimonial proposition, he is quite at a loss to think of one lady who has attracted his attention sufficiently. However, he does not go far before he falls violently in love with a portrait which is displayed in a photographer's showcase. He then travels in search of the original of the photograph, to meet with many alarming adventures by the way. This is a good rough and tumble comic, and teems with laughable accidents.

ARABELLA AS A CHIMNEY SWEEP.—Arabella, following the upward footsteps of her progressive sex, decides to embrace the profession of chimney sweeping. Her ignorance of the job causes much soot to fly the wrong way. In sweeping the chimney of one household she succeeds in disturbing six or seven households at the same time.

ESSANAY

THE LAIRD OF M'GILLICUDDY (Jan. 23).—Ruth, a charming young coed, breaks her engagement with William Mason. She tells him she wants a titled husband with a fortune. Mason, with a gloomy countenance, returns to his room at the frat house. There gathered are his chums, "Cal" Robbins, Wash Bryant and Sid Rathbun. Noticing the look of discontentment on the face of Mason, they ask the reason for it. Mason tells them. "Cal" looking out of the window sees the milkman and motions for him to come up. Mason leaves the room. The milkman is persuaded and bribed to go to the ball that evening, as the Laird of McGillicudy. The editor of the college paper is given the information that the Laird of McGillicudy would be present at the ball. Ruth, with a number of her girl friends, read the paper and prepare for the big festivities. That evening "Skinny" the milkman, in the costume of a Scotch Highland nobleman, is presented to the ladies at the ball. He dances with Ruth, tears her dress, and disgraces himself generally. Mason, discovering his sweetheart's dress torn, pins it up for her. Admiring his gallant procedure, she smiles at him. Finally, when the clock strikes twelve, the Laird of McGillicuddy, transforming himself into "Skinny" the milkman, by pulling his false beard from his face, tells the group about him that it is about time he was starting on his milk route. Being thoroughly disgusted with royalty, pretty Ruth consents to be the charming bride of Mason.

ECLAIR

AFTER THE SHIPWRECK (Jan. 25).—George Martin, a wealthy yachtsman, puts in at a small port to have his yacht repaired.

It is at the ship-carpenter's home that he first sees Marie, the carpenter's daughter. She is pretty enough to attract him and he is so wonderful to her that any request of his amounts to a command, which she feels she must obey. He takes her on many little strolls and excursions, protesting his love and pleading with her to come with him when his yacht puts off. She consents at last and steals away from home. But where to—and what for?

He soon tires of her simple beauty and cruelly abandons her. Like the true, good girl she is at heart, she returns home—a prodigal, but with the courage to confess her mistake and plead for a chance to atone for her innocent sin. And the large-hearted father forgives.

But the girl can find no rest. Torn between her shame and the love she still bears the man who was the cause of her sorrow, she grieves day after day and declines to almost nothing. Her strength and spirit seem to be at their lowest ebb on the night of a terrific storm at sea.

The storm subsides somewhat and the carpenter and his older daughter go out to see the effects. The girl, peering out over the waters, perceives a human form being tossed about on the waves. Being a hardy swimmer, she jumps into the water, strikes out with a long, steady stroke and rescues the victim of the wreck.

She brings the man ashore and he proves to be none other than Martin—her sister's betrayer. But the old carpenter has gone on ahead to prepare a bed and stimulants for the victim. Martin is carried to the house and placed in the room where Marie is lying in a half-delirious sleep. Martin is revived and recognizes her first—the girl, too, becomes conscious of his presence and recognizes him. The old father realizes the truth and rises in a rage.

Marie notices it and where she at first hesitates to give way to her impulse of love and immediate forgiveness, she now decides instantly, for she knows her father's furious anger would mean disaster for the man she loves. She throws herself between them, pleading with her father to forgive as she forgave—and the tender-hearted old carpenter stays his hands and grants her plea.

And Martin, shamed into a full realization of what had gone before and with his eyes open to a finer humanity than he had ever met fell on his knees to the girl. He kissed the hem of her skirts, her hands, and then her lips as she bent down to meet his. For where love is, sorrow must fly.

THE ONE WHO HAD TO PAY (Jan. 29).—"Why, old man, won't you sit down and have a game with us?"

"No, thank you," answered young Childs, but the expression on his face showed clearly that if he would not play, it was simply because he had no money.

The butler of the gambling house entered.

"A letter for you, Mr. Archie."

The letter was from his father, a well-to-do farmer and a very prominent man in a little town up State. It contained a check for $1,000—"the last," the old man wrote, "he would send."

At four o'clock in the morning the money was gone, and Archie, in despair at his loss, agreed to become the head of a fake mining company—in other words, to sell to a gang of the lowest kind of brokers the name made honorable by his father's career.

And the plan worked. Proud to see his son at the head of what he believed to be a big financial enterprise, the old farmer invests all his money in the company. The friends who have known him for such a long time, follow his example, and the money which soon flows into the brokers' hands is squandered by them and young Childs on wine, women and gambling.

The climax came one night during a supper the promoters were giving in a private dining-room of one of the biggest hotels. It was a feast of pleasure and the guests were those of the prettiest of the "Great White Way." In the midst of their revelry one of their friend's attendants rushes in shouting, "the police have raided the office and are coming here!" The warning is sufficient to those who knew, and young Archibald W. Childs learns for the first time that he has been a party to a swindle and that he must either fly with the rest or submit to arrest.

They escape from the office and into a taxi, where Archie's chorus-girl friend persuades him to assume a disguise and leave the country. The plan works and they are soon on their way to Europe.

It is the father of young Childs who now has to pay. Ruined, he finds himself repulsed and insulted by his friends, who have all lost heavily in the fake company. And alone in his empty and desolate house, he would be about to pay with his life for his son's folly, if the charity of one of his wealthy neighbors had not saved him.

Aboard the big liner, young Childs feels safe, but he had not reckoned with modern inventions. Every day on the boat a newspaper is printed containing the news secured by wireless. The big swindle being the sensation of the day, the ship's daily paper printed full details.

Here the young scapegrace finds an article telling of his father's desperate condition, and he is greatly affected by the shock of realization that his poor old father has been "The One Who Had to Pay." The ship detectives had been watching the strange young man, and taking the tip from his emotion on reading of the elder Child's condition, the young fugitive is arrested.

The story rings true in every scene, and the details are made prominent by such an artistic handling that the smoothness of the development of the story gives it added strength.

LITTLE MOTHER OF THE BLACK PINE TRAIL (Jan. 30).—In the newest of the Eclair's now famous series of the frozen Yukon region, we find several additions to the striking gallery of unfamiliar types inaugurated by "Silent Jim," all moving through one of the prettiest and most stirring dramas of the season.

The "Little Mother"—otherwise called Babbie—is a young widow, who bravely struggles to maintain herself and her six-year-old daughter, Marie, in the harsh, inhospitable northland, whither fate has cast her adrift. Just outside Babbie's cabin, leaning at a dangerous angle, stands a venerable black pine tree, which, since men first came to the North, has ever seemed on the point of falling. When Jim Stone begs Babbie to marry him, she laughingly dismisses him with a promise that she will be his wife "when the black pine falls."

One day Jim's younger brother, George, comes to the "Little Mother's" cabin to persecute her with his ignoble protestations. He is followed thither by his discarded love, Julia, a woman notorious in the camps. The latter arrives just in time to hear George's passionate declaration to Babbie. His words lash her primitive soul into a frenzy of jealousy. As Babbie raises a gun to ward off the insulter, the enraged Julia steals up behind her, and blindfolding her, pulls the trigger. Stone falls dead and Julia flees. Babbie is immediately apprehended, and although Jim tries to shield her in every way, she is taken off to prison. She begs Jim to stay in her cabin and be a father to little Marie, for ere the black pine falls, she tells him, she will return.

Christmas comes. The Storm King rages. The black pine, loaded with its weight of snow and ice, totters and trembles under each renewed blast of the wind.

Julia, tortured by remorse, comes to the cabin in Jim's absence to kiss the child. Jim returns unexpectedly and the woman is forced to conceal herself in the loft. From her biding place she witnesses a pathetic scene which makes her resolve to bring the "Little Mother" back to baby Marie before that Christmas Day is over.

How she accomplished this—how the black pine comes crashing down under its burden of years and ice—how Babbie and Jim are united—and how Julia expiates her sin—are all too good in the unfolding in the picture to be spoiled by anticipating them here.

THE CALL OF THE BLOOD.—This is a story of two white children whose parents die on the frontier. The boy is adopted by an army officer and in time becomes a Lieutenant. The girl is brought up by Indians and promised in marriage to the son of a chief.

The Lieutenant and the girl meet and, not knowing of the relationship existing between them, fall in love. The Indian brave discovers his betrothed in the arms of the white man and a quarrel ensues. The girl protects her white lover, but is finally led away. In the fight the locket she wears containing her mother's picture falls unnoticed. The brave carries her to camp, where the chiefs sit in council. The Lieutenant finds the locket and sees the portrait of his mother. Surprised, then horrified, he hurries to camp. Standing between her lover and her brother, the girl is allowed to choose her future path. It is "The Call of the Blood" and sorrowfully she departs with her brother. There is a beautiful finish to this picture. Heartbroken, cheated of his love by the laws of the civilized, the Indian brave throws aside his buckskins and, once again a savage in breechclout, stands silhouetted against the sky, hands upraised, praying to his gods.

NOTES

The Hochstetter Utility Company's Production of "The Life of John Bunyan" and "Pilgrim's Progress," which has been eliciting so much admiration throughout the country, was exhibited at Greenwich, Conn., on Tuesday night, January 14th, with tremendous success.

* * * *

R. O. Bartholomew, Cleveland's first dance hall inspector, has been elected moving picture censor for that city, at a salary paid by moving picture men of $51 weekly

* * * *

The following interesting item is from the Erie, Pa., Times of December 31st:

"Confident that moving pictures help to relieve cases of insanity by diverting the mind of the patient from his affliction, Supt. H C. Eyman, of the Massillon State Hospital, has made arrangements to take moving pictures to the bedside of every bedridden patient in the institution.

"The able-bodied patients will attend the moving picture shows which are given every week in McKinley hall.

"Superintendent Eyman has secured a baby kinetoscope which weighs only sixteen pounds and which can be attached to an electric light socket. The machine was purchased by voluntary contributions from the employees of the institution.

"'Moving pictures undoubtedly are of great benefit to insane patients', said Superintendent Eyman to-day."

* * * *

Albert E. Smith, of the Vitagraph Company of America, was married on Tuesday, January 7th, to Hazel Neason, a moving picture actress. The ceremony was performed at the church of St Gregory the Great in West Eighty-ninth street, New York City.

* * * *

Report has it that Gene Gauntier, who in private life is Miss Genevieve Liggett, of Kansas City, is now leading her own company, and is producing motion picture plays in Florida at the rate of one each month.

* * * *

Exclusive rights to fifteen of the best and most famous melodramas written by Lincoln J. Carter, the novelist, have been purchased by the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, and will be produced in motion pictures. The productions will be under the direct supervision of Mr. Carter, who not only will write the scenarios for the various plays, but will also direct the several companies producing them.

* * * *

Rex de Rosselli, of the Selig Colorado Studios, recently underwent an operation for the removal of a piece of fractured bone from his hip. Mr. Rosselli is now recovering rapidly.

* * * *

Wallace Reid, director of one of the "Flying A" companies, sustained severe injuries to his left leg when on horseback. He was giving chase to a runaway on the boulevard recently. His horse fell with rider underneath.

Mr. Reid's left leg was pinned beneath his mount, and at first it was feared a bone had been broken. He suffered, however, a severe sprain of the left ankle which rapidly swelled. He is now on the road to recovery.

KINEMACOLOR ANIMATED MAP OF THE BALKANS

A most interesting and instructive map has been arranged by the Kinemacolor method which is at once a lesson in history and geography. This map shows by color waves the political history of the Balkan States and of Turkey in Europe from 1360 to 1913. On it the spectator sees each advance and retreat of the Ottoman power and each uprising of the subject Christian population vividly illustrated. Something unique in trick photography.

Six Beautiful Premiums FOR YOU

Your assistance and co-operation in increasing the number of subscribers to THE MOTION PICTURE STORY MAGAZINE is desired.

As you are a reader of this magazine you know all about it, and can tell others of its interesting photoplay stories, portraits of picture players, remarkable illustrations, chats with the players, answers to inquiries and the set of twelve beautiful portraits in colors we send to each subscriber.

In return for your assistance we are going to give you a chance to secure a year's subscription FREE, or one or all of five other valuable premiums.

Below is given a list of the six premiums and the number of subscriptions required to earn them.

THE SIX PREMIUMS

Three New Subscriptions will entitle you to one of the following: "One Year's subscription to THE MOTION PICTURE STORY MAGAZINE; a book entitled "Moving Pictures—How They Are Made and Worked"; Bound Vol. No. III of THE MOTION PICTURE STORY MAGAZINE.

Two New Subscriptions will entitle you to a copy of the book "Portraits of Popular Picture Players."

One New Subscription will entitle you to a Big Ben Binder, or a year's subscription to THE CALDRON.

Write for subscription blanks and circular giving full description of these valuable premiums. Don't delay, but do it today.

Having made a favorable arrangement with one of the largest clock companies in this country, can now offer to its readers a Regular Eight Day Clock, 38½ inches high, with a 12-inch dial, and a subscription to the Moving Picture News for one year for $4.45.

This clock is first-class in every respect and would cost you a great deal more than the price we charge you for both the clock and subscription combined.

The offer is good for old or new subscribers, and is offered for a limited period to show you how you can get two GOOD articles for a small outlay, and you need both.

REMIT BY CHEQUE OR POST OFFICE MONEY ORDER

NOTE:—As three of these clocks can be forwarded by freight at the same cost as one only (the three weighing under 100 lbs.), it will pay you to send in three subscriptions for one delivery to the same freight office at $4.45 each and divide the freight cost.

Each clock is packed in a wooden case, f.o.b. at the factory, Forestville, Conn., weight 30 lbs. Have your local agent advise you just what the freight charges will be.

THE MOTOR DRIVEN MOTIOGRAPH EQUIPMENT No. 1002-M

APPROVED BY NATIONAL BOARD OF FIRE UNDERWRITERS

IS THE BEST PROJECTION MACHINE ON EARTH

We invite comparison with the heaviest advertised machine. You will find that liberality is a better salesman than paid space in journals.

You get more real and actual value in one $250.00 MOTIOGRAPH than in two machines of that price of another make.

Our quality is not to be compared with those cheap, heavily advertised, "assembled" machines you have wasted good money on.

The most successful watch factory.

The most successful automobile factory.

The most successful Motion Picture Machine factory is that one which still does, and always did, make every part and screw in one factory and under the personal management of its own officers.

Beware of any "assembled" machine—Buy the machine that invites mechanical comparison, and yet, projects the most perfect picture there is—that "painted on the wall" kind.

OLLA PODRIDA

TWO or three things on my mind this week may well be called "Olla Podrida." First, I want to get after some of the directors. Some of these men seem altogether too big for their boots, and their hats are a little too small for them. They presume too much, and assume a great deal more than they know. I have been watching some so-called expert directors' work on the screen recently, and for lack of artistic ability and being unable to grasp the idea of the scenario, the result shows plainly. The scenario writer knows what he is writing about. The scenario editor selects the scenario, hands it to the director, who perhaps has preconceived ideas of his own, and he forthwith takes liberties with the ideas of the scenario writer, and also of the editor, or selector. The result is a lack in the grasping of both the artistic and the dramatic elements in the scenario, and shows very bad taste in the placing of certain characters in the scenes. It looks very much as though certain actors and actresses are the whole picture, and so the true atmosphere of the scenario becomes lost by the individuality of the actors. Of course, I am aware the leading lady should lead, but not become too prominent; the same with the leading man.

Again, some directors lack taste in the selection of costumes, or is this the property man? It may be the latter's fault, but the lynx eye of the director ought to see such incongruities as an Egyptian princess wearing number four shoes with high heels, which almost pitch her onto her nose, and corsets that certainly are anything but graceful. In my opinion, the director is the secondary, or tertiary, man If a director in the legitimate theatre dared to alter the lines of the playwright, and put people into false positions on the stage, what would happen? The same applies to the scenario. The director is there to interpret the ideas of the scenario writer and the selector of the scenario, and he should make himself conversant in every degree with the idea of the writer before he attempts to stage the plot, then carry out the letter of the scenario.

It is not my province to mention names or select out individuals, but I saw a picture from the hands of a director who claims he is head and shoulders above everybody else in the profession which any stage carpenter could have put on better than he did. Verb. sap.

* * * *

MY articles on education are certainly bearing fruit. A short while ago I took extracts from one school where a class in English gave their ideas on the Cinematograph art. This week I have pleasure in presenting my readers with a Term Essay, written by a high school girl of sixteen, and for perspicuity and clearness of reasoning this miss certainly knows her subject well, and much real good by all in the industry can be obtained through a perusal of the essay.

A principal of one of the prominent colleges wrote me a few days ago to the effect that if the manufacturers would only carry out the instructions given to them by the Censorship Board, the public would benefit by them, and further, that if they would make true historical subjects, more teachers would take their classes to the theatre, whereby they might learn many things to their advantage. He further said that the absurdity of the Board of Education acting as a censor board was comical in the extreme. He would sooner hand the censorship to his washerwoman, who would no doubt give a better opinion of the value of the films from the people's standpoint than would that suggested from the Board of Education.

THIS brings me to another point on the Censorship Board. The New York State Exhibitors' League is going on the right track by appointing from themselves a committee to censor the pictures, and if they do accomplish this that they have set out to do, I am quite sure that much better results will show, because a committee of exhibitors would know better what would suit them than does the present method of censoring the films in any city so far which has appointed censor boards. The censor boards as at present constituted are easy-get-at-ables. For instance, a Western film was brought before a censor board one week and condemned in toto. What was the astonishment of the members of the board some three or four weeks later to see this same American film brought before them again, exactly as it was three weeks previously, and then they were ordered to pass the film, which they did after much protest and the elimination of a few scenes. Of course, the secretaries would lose their jobs and would have to seek other employment if they did not do as they were told; therefore, as I have argued in these columns before, that the National Exhibitors' League appoint a committee which shall be absolutely unbiased is the best way out of the difficulty.

Alfred H. Saunders.

TERM ESSAY

"The following essay, written by Alice Friedman, a sixteen-year-old miss and student of Erasmus Hall High School, of Brooklyn, N. Y., is her subject for a term essay, which is required as part of the curriculum of the school.

"In writing term essays, the pupils are given their own choice of the topic they desire to discuss. Miss Friedman undertook to treat upon the present agitation by so-called reformers against motion pictures, and proves (though she is not by any means a so-called 'picture fan'; she only visits the 'movies' occasionally, due to the fact that her time is occupied in other channels, mainly school studies) that this uncalled-for antagonism is entirely out of place and wrong in every sense of the word.

"She further proves by her short but to the point article that the art of cinematography is not destined to a mission of corruption, but is an excellent agency for the uplift of mankind and will in time be an authoritative agency for the curing of the many social and physical ills that beset society in general."

Resolved, That Moving Pictures Should Not Be Abolished

This subject is of great interest, for it is being discussed wherever moving pictures appear. The reason for its importance is that the overthrow of moving pictures would concern all those earning a livelihood by it. There are very many people to whom this subject is of great interest, the first of whom, as I have before stated, being the owners and employees of moving picture theatres; secondly, the owners of theatres where only plays are shown, for surely it would be to their advantage if moving picture theatres were abolished, for they claim that these have taken away many people from the theatres; thus they are speaking simply for their own greed and profit.

Another class of people interested in this subject are the ministers of the churches, who say that moving pictures are keeping away the people from attending church, which statement, of course, must sound ludicrous to any intelligent ear, for if a man be bad, there are many other wicked places besides moving pictures where he could spend the Sabbath, if he were unwilling to go to church.

Lastly, the Board of Education is very interested in this question, for it is being discussed whether moving pictures shall be introduced in the public schools, so that studies such as history, geography, chemistry, botany, etc. may be made more explicit and incite greater interest in the pupils.

The origin of this question dates back only in recent years. For some time people thought, and some still think, that moving pictures are corrupt, and the fact that moving pictures have spread so widely and become such a power gave rise to the present interest in the question.

I intend to support the fact that moving pictures should not be abolished. I presume that almost everyone knows what moving pictures are and that an explanation is needless. Abolished means that moving pictures be wiped out of existence. With the terms of my statement clear, I shall proceed with my argument proper.

My first issue deals with the fact of the injustice done to employees of moving picture theatres, if these were abolished. It is known that thousands of people are employed in these theatres, many of whom have families to support. Do those people who have such rigid ideas and who are fighting so strenuously against moving pictures ever realize what it would mean to these men to be thrust out of work, with nothing left to them most probably but to starve or become a burden on the government, which body, by the way, takes very little pains to supply the unemployed with decent jobs and living wages, so that they would not need to depend on the so-called charitable institutions?

My next issue, which I consider one of the most important, is the educational value of moving pictures. This topic in itself might serve as a lengthy exposition, but since I have but a limited amount of words, I must express my points as briefly as possible.

The poorer classes—yes, even the middle classes—might never in their lives have the opportunity of seeing the wonderful sights of foreign lands which are depicted in the scenic films, also the pictures which show the life, customs, industries and religion of the peoples in various parts of the earth. Then, too, the great medical experiments which are often seen, showing the latest inventions in the medical field, and the process of grafting flesh and limbs from one being to another, also the pictures which show the dangers of bacteria, first its growth, development and finally the disastrous results. There are hundreds of mothers who, after seeing the disgusting developments of flies, have become very interested in the new movement, "fly-swatting," and also in keeping their entire houses in a cleaner, healthier condition.

There are also certain weekly pictures which show the important current events of the day and thus keep the people in touch with events happening almost in all parts of the globe, and this is far better information than the newspapers would ever give, for, first of all, it is more vivid, and besides, excepting only a few, the newspapers are mostly all sensational and full of exaggeration. Besides, there are many poor people who cannot read, and they derive much pleasure and knowledge from such interesting, educational films.

The next issue is the good influence of moving pictures on the morals of the people. When people see such a picture as "Drink" and others like it, which depict the terrible misery and ending of a drunkard, surely there must be many men, horrified and disgusted, decide to wipe out the curse of drink. Then, too, the pictures which tell of the temptations and pitfalls which await young girls in large cities warn many girls, and perhaps have saved some from taking a step too far. I heard one of our friends who is deeply interested in social affairs relate how, when he had chanced to visit one of the moving picture theatres in the slums, he heard one girl, who was rather pretty but very pale and tired-looking (one of the specimens of unclean factories) say to another, with tears in her eyes, after witnessing a very sad tragedy of the fall of a girl, "My, but I'm glad I seen that picture. Guess it'll help keep me on the straight and narrow path and never let me be tempted by fine clothes or some wicked dandy." Here we have a case true to life. Perhaps these things do not occur in our sphere of life; therefore we go on blindly, never believing that such things exist and that hundreds of ill-fed working girls are daily led into temptation, who, if guided correctly, or warned, might not succumb to wrongdoing; and it is the moving pictures which are bringing these things to light, thus helping other girls.

Another fact which has always seemed absurd to me is that some people say children become "bad" from moving pictures, especially cowboy pictures. Everyone knows that as playing house and loving dolls is inherent with most little girls, so the cowboy craze is with most little boys. Even if boys never saw cowboy pictures, it is their natural instinct to love adventure, horses and military paraphernalia, and every boy is bound to play with and enjoy these things sooner or later. But it is very seldom that there are any serious results, for they soon get over this stage and disregard most of their play toys and gradually become more sensible.

Besides, there is a rule which is being enforced more strictly now that ever, that children under sixteen are positively not admitted to moving picture theatres unless accompanied by parent or guardian, therefore the responsibility lies with the parent entirely whether a child under age shall go to the pictures or not. And girls or boys sixteen or above ought not to be restrained from going to moving pictures, provided they have been properly trained by their parents how to behave and take care of themselves in public. Surely, a parent cannot and ought not make his child a hothouse flower, never allowing a rough wind to touch it, for some day the girl or boy must enter the business world, and it is far better for them if they have a good, clear understanding of things, so that they may know how to meet the difficulties which confront them in life.

Last but not least, each and every person has the right, by law of nature, to enjoy life as well as the next, and it is the small charge of admission to moving picture theatres which enables the poorer classes to have some enjoyment and understand the problems of life better. Therefore, it is not just for those who can afford to go to better places to scornfully snub the moving picture theatres and the people who visit them, for perhaps there is more good to be obtained from moving pictures than from many a Broadway show.

Since it is the people's right to have some enjoyment and since the small charge of admission to moving picture theatres enables them to have it, and since I have shown the various and numerous benefits derived from moving pictures, I still maintain that moving pictures should not be abolished.

PILOT FILMS CORPORATION

The Pilot plant at Yonkers is at last completed, and already has six good "one-reel" negatives to its credit, with a large stock company working every day turning out more. We expect to devote some space to a writeup of this most modern of moving picture plants in a later issue.

In conversation with the general manager, Mr. George A. Magie, we find that the policy of this company is to specialize on very clever, well-directed dramas and fine comedies. For the present the plant will only release one a week, commencing the early part of February, following soon after with two a week.

The policy of the company will be to turn out pictures of a classic nature and avoid anything of a revolting character, such as murder, crime, etc. A step in the right direction. As an illustration of this, we notice their first two releases will be one taken from a poem by Ella Wheeler Wilcox, called "The Two Glasses," and the other suggested by a poem by Frank Olive, called "The Blacksmith's Story." Both these pictures are quite out of the ordinary and will appeal to all kinds of audiences, not only by the character of the story, but by the clever way in which the pictures have been put on.

It must be remembered that while the Pilot Films Corporation is a new company, the people connected with it are not in any sense foreign to the business. The general manager of the company, Mr. George A. Magie, who has been associated with the Solax Company from its inception, has been for the last three months completing the Pilot plant, and gradually completing an organization, with some of the best people in the business. This will assure for the new company good, high-class quality of film, without first overcoming the difficulties experienced by the novice We understand Mr. Magie is leaving in a few days for an extended trip to the different exchanges to show them the advance copies. Much attention and money has been spent on the flexible lighting system, from which the concentration of the light, not only on any set put upon the floor, but any part of the set, carrying out this idea that the company has engaged an expert at a large salary, who will devote his time entirely to the light and shade effects, the camera man being simply an assistant to him. The management has gone to tremendous expense to complete the mechanical efficiency of the picture by correct and proper settings, rugs, draperies, etc.

MOVING PICTURE DAY AT NEW YORK THEATRE CLUB

By M. I. MacDonald

The meeting of the New York Theatre Club, of which Mrs. Belle de Rivera is president, and which was held at the Hotel Astor on the afternoon of Tuesday, January 21, was one of special interest to the readers of this magazine in that it was given up almost entirely to discoursing on the subject of moving pictures.

The gathering was indeed a brilliant affair, and in view of the sloth from which the moving picture is only now emerging, this event spoke perhaps more emphatically than any occurrence up to date, of the place which the moving picture must occupy in the future of the nation.

These were refined, intelligent people who gazed with much earnestness at the faces of the speakers who strove to throw some light on the subject of the abused "movie"; they were not just happenings Some of them had attended out of curiosity, some out of courtesy to the chairman of the day, Mrs. Frank A. Abrahall, but I am glad to be able to say that many were there who were beforehand possessed of a healthy interest in the matter.

The following is the program as presented:

Introduction of Guests of Honor

What was perhaps the most interesting address of the afternoon was that given by Henry Moskowitz. Mr. Moskowitz was in a position to handle his subject in an intelligent manner, having made a study of the matter from more than one viewpoint, and having given it a tremendous amount of thought, which was very evident from the lucid and interesting calibre of his remarks.

One or two of the more important points dwelt upon by Mr. Moskowitz in his address, must serve in the limited space allotted me, to give the general flavor of his remarks with regard to the cheap theatre. "The working girl," says Mr. Moskowitz, "has no emotional connection with her work. She is thinking, most probably, of the ball at Coney Island, or some other affair of the kind. The moving picture theatre, therefore, supplies for her a much-needed change and an outlet to her natural emotional bent." And of the child question, Mr. Moskowitz spoke in a most common sense and sympathetic manner. Said he: "The child lives in the house of dreams; what he sees grips his soul. The mayor was right when he answered those who would deprive the children of the pleasure of viewing the moving pictures. "If you take this away what have you to offer in its place?" The child has natural dramatic instincts which have to be met in some way, and the moving picture fills a heretofore unfilled vacuum in the child's life."

Mr. Moskowitz concluded his remarks by advocating the co-operation of the intelligent public, such as was represented there that afternoon, with manufacturers, exhibitors and all interested, in placing the moving picture on a proper basis, and improving and purifying the product.

A great deal of credit is due Mrs. Abrahall for her excellent judgment in selecting the program, and the fact that the spacious Auditorium was not of sufficient size to accommodate the vast assemblage that crowded beyond the doors, was no doubt largely complimentary to the enthusiasm incited through her untiring efforts in preparing the splendid intellectual treat which delighted the guests.

The guests of honor on this occasion were as follows: Mr. Daniel Frohman, Miss Laurette Taylor, Mrs. Winifred Harper Corley, Mr. Adolph Zukor, Mr. Charles M. Seay, Mrs. Lillian Russell Moore, Mr. Hartley Manners, Mr. John Cort, Mr. Henry Moskowitz, Mrs. John Cort, Mrs. William Tod Helmuth.

MOVING PICTURE EXHIBITORS' ASSOCIATION OF GREATER NEW YORK

Gentlemen: The following is a synopsis of the proceedings of the State board of directors' meeting which was held at the Yates Hotel, in Utica, on Thursday, January 16.

There was present at this meeting the following State officers: Samuel H. Trigger, president of the State; Harold W. Rosenthal, State secretary, New York; B. E. Cornell, State vice-president, Syracuse; R. M. Davidson, State vice-president, Binghamton; John C. Davis, State treasurer, Saugerties; George Wright, president of Albany local; L. C. Smith, vice-president, Schenectady; William A. Douque, president, Utica; Harry Lux, Jr., treasurer, Utica; George H. Morgan, president, Syracuse; A. N. Wolff, president, Rochester; Harry Marsey, vice-president, Buffalo; Jos. Freidman, treasurer, Buffalo; M. D. Gibson, president, Elmira.

The censorship matter was taken up and thoroughly threshed out, suggestions were made that the exhibitors appoint a committee to censor the pictures, and if necessary, get a bill passed through the Legislature covering State censorship. It was also suggested that no member should display a feature or other film which had not been approved of by the censorship board, and notification to this effect be sent to all members of the State.

Matters pertaining to theatres in different locals and the number of reels run was thoroughly discussed, and in Syracuse at the present time all theatres are only showing four reels of pictures and no vaudeville or singing. In Utica they have agreed to run three reels of films. Mr. Wolff, president of the Rochester local, stated that they were going to dispense with vaudeville in all picture theatres in Rochester, and Mr. Smith, of Albany, stated that only one member of the Albany local was running vaudeville. Mr. Friedman, of the Buffalo local, made the same statement regarding all their places. Mr. Davidson, of Binghamton, stated that the Binghamton local consisted of every motion picture exhibitor within five miles of Binghamton, and the work of organizing, although somewhat hard, had proved of great benefit to its members. who were greatly at variance until recently.

Motion made by Mr. Douque and seconded by Mr. Davis that the State board of directors meet every three months in a different city, and that the next meeting be held in Buffalo on the first Tuesday in April. Carried.

Motion made to hold the next annual convention of the State at New York City, on Monday, July 7, 1913, at 9 a. m. Carried.

Mr. Harold W. Rosenthal, chairman of the law and legislative committee, reported the work done thus far to secure the passage of the Griffin bill amending the penal code so that minors may be admitted to moving picture theatres during certain hours and under certain conditions, unaccompanied by parents or guardians, and explained the great amount of work that was necessary for the passage of this bill.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT FILM MERITS

Majestic

"The Cabby and the Demon" is quite acceptable, and contains many laughable situations. It could, however, be curtailed with good effect. A distinct drag and a tacking on of superfluous scenes is felt toward the close of the picture.

Thanhouser

"Her Fireman," with Marguerite Snow in the lead, is a careful bit of work. Pathos and human interest of a decided character is rife throughout.

Punch

"Their First Baby" does not please us specially. We do not favor the part of a baby being played by an adult. The flavor is unwholesome, and the exaggeration is somewhat repulsive.

Gaumont

"In the Claws of the Leopard," a Gaumont two-reel release is a tale of Southern Rhodesia. Portions of this picture are exceptionally good. There are, however, some studio scenes in which the leopard appears that might have been done with better effect out in the open. The production is weak in spots, and lacks the usual Gaumont smoothness. The repeated re-flashing, for instance, of the struggle of the woman with the leopard reduces the realism of this portion of the picture.

"French Alpine Manoeuvers" is a very splendid scenic, showing at the same time the method of training the French soldiers in the severest sort of manoeuvering.

"Life or Death" is a thrilling drama of a very acceptable sort. We fancy, however, that a microscope might have been made good use of in distinguishing the serum for use in the cerebro spinal meningitis case from that containing the fever germs. However, this is only a suggestion which may prove to have origin in our ignorance of things medical.

Solax

"The Coming of Sunbeam" is something of a triumph for Solax. It is exceptionally good. The story of the little child left in a hamper at the door of old Major Neal, his spurning of the baby girl, his gradually yielding to the magnetism of the child, and the final reconciliation between father and daughter—the mother of the child—are well represented. This picture is to be recommended for all occasions.

"Mother and Daughter," on the contrary, is founded on a theme which is most repellent. In the first place, the mother and daughter in the picture have not more than three years' difference in their ages; and secondly, no one wants to know of a mother and daughter being in love with the same man. There is no excuse for the filming of this story.

Crystal

"Box and Cox" is a very excellent little comedy bit. The comedy is gotten out of the fact that Mrs. Bouncer, in order to strengthen the family exchequer, rents the same room to Box, who works all night, and Cox, who works all day The plan works O. K. for a time, but the crisis comes when Box accidentally finds Cox in his bed asleep. A stirring time ensues.

"With Her Rival's Help," on the same reel, is also an excellent sample of comedy. Both of the above comedies are suitable for any occasion.

Eclair

"Little Mother of the Black Pine Trail" is a picture whose merit, so far as production goes, has its answer in the fact that the attention and interest of the spectator is held from first to last The story is laid in Canada in the Winter season. The general atmosphere of the picture and the seriousness of the players in portraying the characters allotted them lend a magnetism that is irresistible. Only one or two bad spots mar the smoothness of this production, one of which is the falling of the black pine, which is clearly a pasteboard tree. This might have been avoided.

Gem

"A North Woods Romance," also a Canadian story, has a number of inconsistencies which might have been avoided A good story has been more or less spoiled by the carelessness of the director.

Frontier

"The Wild Flower of Pino Mountain" is a film of fair merit. It is too bad, however, that the two young backwoodsmen in the story are sent to comfort the deathbed of a dying man with pistols in their hands.

Powers

"The Rugged Coast" is very excellent indeed. It has the advantage of splendid seacoast scenes. This picture is thoroughly picturesque in production, as well as interesting in plot.

"How He Won Her" is a comedy which will always get a laugh. The manner in which "One Round" Casey is done out of the girl in Jake's sleep-walking ruse is a scream.

Kinemacolor

"Romance of Princess Romana" is a gorgeously costumed drama. In production it is not all that we could wish. The wonderful method of Kinemacolor, however, does its part superbly.

"The House That Jack Built" has a fair sprinkling of comedy. If suggestions are the order of the day we might say that a spectacular drama with the Ibsen sentiment might be based on the house-building idea.

A splendid scenic was also exhibited at the projection room of Kinemacolor this week, entitled "A Visit to the Jungfrau" (one of the most magnificent of the Swiss mountains).

Essanay

"What George Did" is good comedy. The complications which arose from the many jokes of the conscienceless George, the office boy, will keep any audience in roars of laughter from first to last of the film.

Edison

"The Mountaineers" is not Edison's best by any means. The action of the piece is not at all times smooth. It is a story of moonshiners, such as has been done repeatedly, but carries in it at the same time a good deal that is interesting.

Biograph

"Thou Shalt Not Kill" is repellent in theme. The testifying of the little girl against her mother, which testimony brought the innocent mother under sentence of death, is neither pleasant to contemplate nor natural in instinct. Otherwise the production is fairly acceptable.

Nestor

"His Brother's Keeper" is one of the best Nestor productions we have seen for some time. The work of the actors is more than ordinarily finished, and it is a decided advance on former Nestor work.

THEIR FIRST BABY
Punch release January 30.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Ideas—and Then Some

THE machine-built script does not appeal to us—by the machine-made script we mean the made-to-order story much favored by the hack writer. We read a cleverly put argument the other day in which the scribe was urged to build his story by chalk-line and spirit-level. There are far too many machine-manufactured stories being released as it is. Some of these solid, every-day stories will undoubtedly get past the editor—unless the unusual story dealing with the same plot happens to come along in the same mail. Then the every-day story will be returned to the every-day writer. You cannot write the original and unusual script by sitting down to the typewriter and "just thinking up the usual something" and building around it. The unusual story must contain the unusual idea or situation. Get the unusual idea and then your development is bound to prove more or less original. Inspiration is a mighty good qualification for the picture playwright. Inspiration is two-thirds labor and enthusiasm, with a dash of observation and originality. Stevenson said genius was just hard work. Genius is a negligible quantity without inspiration. There are unusual ideas all around you. See them. Get your idea and you should have your inspiration. Ideas are not so scarce as some people would have you believe. Ideas for scripts can be gleaned everywhere. In your home, among your acquaintances, on the street, in your place of business, in church and, well, everywhere. Trained habits of observation, a notebook and a pencil are necessary equipments. When you have your idea, you have the foundation for your picture play. Not so long since, a Philadelphia publication boasting of great circulation, published a newspaper story called "The Fortunes of the Sun." That story caused great attention. Why? Simply because it dealt with a question that has been known to exist in almost every newspaper office in the land.

Trained newspaper men have known of the open secret but not one thought of putting the facts into an article. The man out West did. He got big pay from the magazine and will get more in royalties when Cohan & Harris make a play of the sketches. The Daily Sun a newspaper, started with the policy of printing ALL the news without fear or favor. The newspaper didn't last long. Newspapers do not print ALL the news without fear or favor. Advertisers have something to say anent the policy of almost every newspaper. This writer thought it would make a good story. He had an idea. It was such an established condition that no other newspaperman thought of it. The idea was rather new to many outside the fraternity and it was a winner. The above is given as an example of how the unusual idea is staring the average scribe in the face continuously. You do not have to sit down once or twice weekly and put out the machine-made ideas. If you are any good at all, you will soon learn to sit down with an original idea, an unusual idea, and the rest will come more easily.

Sargent Directing 'Em

Epes Winthrop Sargent, picture play author, has become a director and is putting on original split-reel comedies for the new Ramo concern, Film Supply Company. They do say his pictures are corkers. All writers will hope for his unbounded success.

Death of Will Carleton

Will Carleton, the poet and successful picture playwright, died recently at his home in Brooklyn, N. Y. Carleton was numbered among our personal friends, was a reader of this department, and often encouraged us by words of commendation. His death takes from this world, a gentleman and a scholar, and a man who did honor to the ranks of picture play writers. His name will live forever in the history of the world's best literature.

Mutual Benefit Societies

Get together, ye picture playwrights, for mutual benefit. Where there are two or more writers in a community why not arrange for joint conferences for the purpose of exchanging experiences? Two heads are better than one, and such meetings are sure to be instructive. We know of several "partnerships" that have been formed from such gatherings and these writing "partnerships" have proven remunerative.

Watch the Advertisements

Keep your eye on the advertising columns of the News. You are safe in submitting your scripts to the concerns found named in this publication. We do not accept shady or misleading advertisements, for the News is accepted and read by the highest classed people within and without the moving picture industry.

Personality Counts

Personality counts in the script as well as elsewhere. We got a letter from a well-known director the other day, in which he discussed the work of an unknown picture playwright, a "find" whom we recommended to his undivided attention. Among other things the intelligent director wrote:

> "There is an indescribable something in his scripts that appeals to both editor and director. He is never anything else but himself and he is certainly original. We read his ideas with personal pleasure even when some of them prove not entirely suited to our purposes."

This writer has little technique, as yet, but there is no machine work in his methods. He observes, ensnares a good idea, handles it originally, and develops it with concentration and enthusiasm. His action stands out, even in the script it "goes over." It impresses. Louis Reeves Harrison says: "Technique is, like health, a valuable thing to understand in order that we may know what to avoid, but health is spontaneous and so is good acting. Those who study the subject closely come to know in time that it is through the earnestness of a man and the depths of his sure convictions that we reach contact with his soul." Mr. Harrison's statement is also applicable to picture play writing. The unconscious appeals in some manuscripts are contagious. They affect the director sometimes, and spur him on to more artistic efforts, and thus the inspired author is responsible in no uncertain way for one of those occasional picture plays that "go over."

Exaggerated Scenes

Exaggerated scenes of any nature are being eliminated from picture plays and it is well for the script writer to remember this fact. Every action is promised by leading directors to perfect the detail of correctness. Rather than attempt to revise scripts containing exaggerated and unconvincing action, directors of the Universal have been advised to reject them entirely. There is a demand for pictures entirely at variance with previous productions, and writers should appreciate this new movement and get in on the ground floor. Write consistent, plausible, logical stories devoid of unnecessary or repulsive crime, and eliminate would-be "heroes" of the underworld. You will stand a much better chance for marketing.

Lo, the Poor Indian

Be careful about your Indian chieftain who waves a big knife and chases the lovely maiden around the frontier post. Our guess is, that within a few short months the Indian principals in Western playlets will be depicted in different characters than that of "revengeful villains." The friends of "Lo" are starting a crusade against making the "Noble Red Man" the goat, and many directors are now utilizing the Mexican for the "dirty work." Educated Indians say they do not object to the depiction of their tribes in true historical way, but they do object to having "White Eagle" pictured constantly as the worst ever. They assert that the Indian has a proud place in America's history. Maybe.

The Contract Writer

We do not think the contract writer is lessening the market for the free lance. The contract writer seems to be an object of universal attack by the rank and file, according to our correspondence. The man who writes on contract cannot keep up a high standard week in and week out. We know, because we have written on contract. Thirty-five dollars a week for two sure-fire scripts is not enough money, either. The Universal tried it unsuccessfully. As free lances the same writers could evolve two scripts weekly and sell them at twenty-five dollars per script and get fifteen dollars more a week for the same work. Of course, there is the genius who, three years ago, dashed off scripts as a side-line and averaged fifty dollars weekly. However, nobody ever believed that statement, and one good script weekly at twenty-five, thirty-five and sometimes fifty dollars, is better than two scripts weekly with sometimes both below the standard. You have an equal opportunity with the contract writer if your scripts contain "the goods."

"By the Sweat of Your Brow"

"By the sweat of your brow shall ye eat bread," applies to script writing as well as any other line of endeavor. Work! Banish the imp of discouragement and work! When the ideas will not come and your mind works slowly, these things happen to any mental worker, just keep pegging away. Write something. If you cannot do anything else, try and rewrite picture plays you have seen on the screen the day previously. It is practice, and practice makes perfect. Of course, do not submit these revamped stories to editors, for you will get into their ill-graces if you do. But the practice will serve to keep your mental machinery oiled and "your hand in" until the right idea comes along.

The Synopsis Question

R. D. Armstrong, in the Photoplay Author, writing on the script synopsis says: "Put most of your thought and care into a clear, concise synopsis. Forget your audience in the theatre and endeavor to inspire the manuscript reader with the spirit of your idea. The first three stories I ever sold were not in picture play form." There is some meat in Mr. Armstrong's assertion anent the synopsis. Many months ago we urged the sharply drawn, brief, comprehensive synopsis. Condensation is an art, and a difficult one. The most difficult thing the majority of newspaper apprentices have to learn is the art of "boiling down." The same difficulty is experienced by short story and moving picture play writers. The art of saying just as well or better in fifty words what others use three hundred words to tell, is an art well worth cultivating. It is peculiarly essential in script writing. The writer should forget his "audience" whether writing synopsis or action, and should invariably endeavor to inspire the editor with the spirit of his idea. It is true that many directors work almost strictly from the synopsis, but it is also a fact that when the action is convincingly developed in scenes, the author will get more money for his work.

Countless Revisions

"Countless revisions make the acceptable picture play," asserts Mr. J. R. Clemens, in the Photoplay Author. This is true in the case of the beginner. What is worth doing is worth doing well. With added experience, less revision becomes necessary, but it is always well to go over one's work carefully and, where it seems necessary to revise, why revise, whether script has or has not been finally drafted. Mr. Clemens says that two winning scripts of his were first planned and submitted as short stories for magazines. Others have had like experience. "How can we be original," asks Mr. Clemens. "No two persons look at the same thing from the same point of view. Write down things as they strike you. That is being original. The idea may not appeal to the editor, but at least he sees its originality, and he will watch your future offerings with more interest than those of a man who sends in a composite idea squeezed from the points of view of many." In other words avoid the machine-made script, which we mention this week, and be individual.

Lists of Releases

Read the list of releases in the News each week. They indicate the kind of story each company is turning out. Do not submit a Western story to a company that is devoting particular attention to split-reel comedy, nor the comedy to a concern that is in the market for strictly high-class society drama. A study of the released stories every week will give you a line on the kind of scripts desired.

Unusual Experiences

The picture playwright who remains in the harness for a year or so will have many unusual experiences. Sometimes his scripts will be purchased and never produced. He will sometimes wait a year or more before seeing a story on the screen. Sometimes he will sell a script in ten days, and again three months will elapse before his pay comes. One conscientious writer asked us last week if he had not better return fifteen dollars to a certain company. He wrote that he had received pay for a script two years ago and it had never been filmed. We told him to keep his money. He took his goods to market, sold them, and it was up to the purchaser. A certain editor paid us $35 each for three scripts two years ago. They may be in his overcoat pocket yet. We had another director take our script to Europe and back, hold it six months, and finally return it in good shape. We tried every other concern with it, had it rejected, resubmitted again to the original company, which purchased it and produced it. We sold a historical play to a prominent concern and were paid for it within ten days. It was held a year. Then the script was returned to us with the compliments of the manufacturer, who stated that they were not then prepared to produce it and that we could keep the money because the script had been ordered, and that we could sell the script elsewhere if we wished. We were satisfied. We have seen our work credited to others; enjoyed the privilege once of dropping into a theatre and viewing the first script we ever sold, revamped under another title and shown for the edification of a large audience; have had our scripts mutilated, torn into two parts; used for memorandum pads, etc. However, happily, such practices are virtually a thing of the past. It's all in the game, and script writers must have their ups and downs as well as others.

WM. LORD WRIGHT.

MR. ARTHUR V. JOHNSON

Mr. Arthur V. Johnson's first experience on the stage was gained in the hard and trying school of melodrama.

Since then he has supported Robert Mantell and Marie Wainwright in Shakespearean productions.

He entered the moving picture field with the Biograph Co., remaining with them two years as leading man.

Since then he has worked for the Reliance, with whom he closed in order to join the Lubin Co. as leading man.

ADOLPH ZUKOR, THE BENEFACTOR OF POSTERITY!

His movement to immortalize the most notable characterizations of the famous plays of the day makes all futurity his debtor. The earnest labor he is conducting will establish a monument to the actor's art that will be a permanent memorial of his own efforts.

Among the interesting and important personalities in filmdom, the name of Adolph Zukor stands pre-eminent and prominent. His activities are watched with interest and expectancy, his plans are followed with religious regularity, and his movements and manœuvers are observed by every one in the industry with increasing curiosity and wonder. Within a comparatively short time, Mr. Zukor has attained a position with so much prestige that it seems incredible—yet wholly creditable. Virtually a newcomer in the field of film manufacturing, he has acquired so comprehensive a mastery of the manufacturing situation, and so authoritative a knowledge of the requirements and demands of the public, that many of the leading figures in the manufacturing centres older in years and experience, but lacking the native force of leadership and the intuitive sense of perspective and proportion so distinctly evident in Mr. Zukor's composition, are content to sit at his feet and imbibe his wisdom, in the manner of the disciples of old

The enormous influence of Mr. Zukor's present position and the substantial promise of greater achievement in the future are founded on those qualities which are embodied in every unusual success. Mr. Zukor possesses prophetic instinct and visionary power, allied with an astute practical sense, a combination very rare but always creative and productive. A startling dream, a bold plan to immortalize the most noted characterizations of the famous players of the day, via the agency of motion pictures, and a vigorous display of energetic endeavor and enterprise to culminate the dream in an even more thrilling realization, and it might be said, a realization far in advance of the time set by, and far beyond the expectations of the practical idealist who originated the vast idea, is the story of Mr. Zukor's success, and, incidentally, that of the Famous Players' Film Company.

After Mr. Zukor had originated his stupendous idea to produce the great plays of the day in motion pictures, he set about to form an organization, efficient in every department and capable of carrying on his vast plan to successful culmination. With that natural generalship which is displayed in all his activities, Mr. Zukor appreciated the necessity and advisability of connecting with one of the foremost legitimate producers. With this end in view, he approached Daniel Frohman, whose prestige and influence among the legitimate managers have been undisputed for a score of years and whose endeavors to uplift the stage have won world-wide recognition and endorsement. Mr. Frohman shared Mr. Zukor's hopes for better pictures for the present generation and the erection of a lasting monument to the art of the famous actors of the day, whose genius had until now died with themselves and had left only the memory of their names. Imbued with Mr. Zukor's enthusiasm and encouraged by the powerful incentive of a worthy work, Mr. Frohman became an active member of the Famous Players' Film Company, and in the capacity of managing director, has done much to bring about the astounding success of the company. After allying Mr. Frohman with his movements, Mr. Zukor interested Mr. Porter, of Rex fame, to join the company as technical director, and the working staff was complete.

The first production of the Famous Players' Film Company, "Queen Elizabeth," with Sarah Bernhardt, sprang into instant popularity, and is still the sensation of the country. "Queen Elizabeth" was produced in Paris, and while the subject was in the process of production, work was already started on the Famous Players' studio in this city, which is now fully equipped, and in which the "Prisoner of Zenda," the Famous Players' last production, was made. As regards the studio, it might be said that it is one of the largest in the world, and embodies many striking innovations and helpful adjuncts.

The plan of this company to bring the leading players of the day within physical and financial reach of all and to perpetuate the greatest characterizations of the contemporary stage for the great benefit of posterity, have won universal interest and unanimous commendation. The educational value of the movement cannot be exaggerated or even estimated. Aside from its primary power to elevate the motion picture to a dignity and distinction hitherto unhoped for and a stage equal to the better element of the legitimate drama, the Famous Players' Film Company will exert a tremendous educational influence and will stimulate a wider general interest in classical literature and the organized drama. Such an educational stimulus, for instance, as is to be derived from a series of Shakespearean productions, in which the Famous Players' Company will star the eminent Shakespearean interpreters, Sothern and Marlowe, will bear a universal and permanent value, and through the visual illustration of the scenes in the plays, which even the stage is unable to produce, will serve to increase the interest in Shakespearean studies among all classes

One of the striking factors in the huge plans of the Famous Players' Film Company, is the determination to make every production surpass the one that preceded it, however difficult that may be. "The Prisoner of Zenda" is a convincing illustration of this principle. Massive and magnificent as was "Queen Elizabeth," the "Prisoner of Zenda" exceeds the artistic value of the first production, and is more stupendous in scenery, settings and general scope.

"The Prisoner of Zenda" was produced under the personal direction of Mr. Frohman, and a peculiar point of interest regarding the production is that the original play was Mr. Frohman's greatest dramatic success and his first experience as a director in motion pictures. The picture (famous) play, several scenes of which are herewith shown, is, of course, more comprehensive than the original play and more graphic than the original story. The tense situations and the thrilling and romantic incidents in the story are augmented with a background of appropriate scenery and luxurious settings that add a note of realism and actuality which Anthony Hope in his original story could convey only by his unusual gift of description, but which, nevertheless, is distinctly inferior to nature's varied language.

"The Prisoner of Zenda" is destined to live forever. It symbolizes the very motive for the organization of the Famous Players' Film Company. Future generations will witness James K. Hackett's vigorous dual characterization of the weak but lovable king, and the strong, earnest, forceful man who guarded and guided his welfare, long after their interpreter has passed into memory. The thrilling story of adventure and romance, the undercurrent of intrigue and malicious energy, dominated by a gentle, tender note of love and sacrifice, and the stern truth which the tale portrays, that even greater than love is duty, will live forever in reality, just as Hope's story will live forever in type.

The Famous Players' Film Company has hastened the eventual destiny of the motion picture. It has brought the future of the film to to-day. It has brought the to-morrow of film possibilities within the scope of to-day. Both to-day and to-morrow, and as long as the record of its work endures, which promises to be further into the future than the imagination can gauge, it will embody the spirit of the century and the dream of the ages—prophetic genius and the eternal energy that dares and does.

ECLAIR CO. GETS EXCLUSIVE RIGHTS TO O. HENRY STORIES

The Eclair Company has scored another winning point. Word comes to us this week from their busy offices that they have secured the exclusive rights to produce in pictures the best of the famous short stories written by O. Henry, who has written more universally popular little tales than any other American writer. His little gems appeal to every class.

When produced with the well-known Eclair quality of photography and direction, these little stories should prove to be one of the hits of the year.

Eclair has already produced in America a number of works by prominent writers, such as Edgar Allan Poe's "The Raven"; Longfellow's, "The Old Clock on the Stairs"; Washington Irving's, "The Spectre Bridegroom." The Eclair American Company has also a fine production of "Robin Hood."

KINEMACOLOR ITEMS.

Mr. William Morris, who is known throughout the amusement world as one of the most progressive of the big vaudeville managers, has announced the details of his great amusement proposition, to be launched Saturday, January 25th, at the New York Theatre.

In connection with the novelty features to be shown on the roof, Mr. Morris has planned to open the New York Theatre with a big vaudeville show and is featuring as the special novelty of the entertainment the wonderful Kinemacolor natural color motion pictures.

The newest productions from the five Kinemacolor companies now producing films in California will be shown in Kinemacolor, and in connection with these startling dramas and amusing comedies will be shown some of the beautiful Kinemacolor tropical, scenic and educational subjects, prominent among which will be the celebrated Kinemacolor Weekly Fashions, a feature that will undoubtedly appeal strongly to the ladies.

Following out their recently announced policy, the Kinemacolor Company of America has opened a Boston office. This is the second of the branch offices of this company to be established, an office in Cincinnati having been opened several weeks ago. Other branch offices will be opened in the near future, the locations being chosen which will permit the Kinemacolor Company of America to most expeditiously and conveniently serve the rapidly growing number of houses which are contracting for the natural color motion pictures. The Boston office is in charge of W. E. Atkinson and is temporarily located at 162 Tremont street. This office will carry a duplicate stock of the entire output of the Kinemacolor Company of America, as well as all the features from the foreign Kinemacolor producing companies. This office will serve all of the New England territory.

E. S. MacDonald and E. R. Powell are two recent additions to the executive staff of the Kinemacolor Company of America. Mr. MacDonald, formerly credit man for Spencer Kellogg & Sons, is working out the details of certain improvements in the routine work of the Kinemacolor Company of America, especially in the shipping department, the great increase in the volume of business being done rendering this systematization necessary. Mr. Powell, who was formerly in the banking business in Buffalo, where he gained much reputation as a system man, will have charge of the film service department of the Kinemacolor Company of America.

It is expected that there will be introduced shortly into the new course in photography recently established at the Syracuse University a division of moving picture photography. A stage and dressing rooms large enough for practical instruction will be built.

On Saturday, January 18th, Marcus Loew's Avenue B Theatre was opened with great eclat. The structure is built on the very spot where Marcus Loew, some forty odd years ago, was born, and was erected at a cost of $100,000.

WHEN THE LAST LEAF FELL
Majestic release January 28th.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

Despite all the newspaper accounts and previous pictures of the Panama Canal, an interview with L. J. Simons, the camera man, of the Feature Film Manufacturing Company, of this city, who accompanied the President Taft party in the recent inspection of the Canal, sounds like a fairy tale of old. The bigness of the work, the luxuriant vegetation, the wonderful engineering, the beautiful tropical coloring, all accentuate the most gigantic undertaking of modern times.

"I was with President Taft at all times," said Mr. Simons, "and he was more like 'one of the boys,' than the head of the great American nation. 'Whenever you want me or the train to halt, just say so,' he was wont to remark. 'Remember this is to be a great message to the whole world, and I wish nothing left out.' After that," went on the cameraman, "I almost bossed the President, halting him at the most advantageous points. On one occasion I stood upon the top of one of the huge locks and secured a picture of President Taft at another lock some thirty feet away. This makes a pretty group of scenes.

"The fact that we went to the very bottom of the Canal, gives the views I brought back a uniqueness and close range that has scarcely been possible before. Since President Taft was interested and curious about all the little points, I invaded places that would not have appealed to the average motion picture man. For the benefit of the inspection party every device and machinery was put in action. It is wonderful to note those monster steam shovels consume earth, rocks and water.

"The view of the water gushing through the gates for the first time was a wonderful sight; the Pedro Miguel locks stand as an example of the highest type of cement work, and the hundreds of workmen look like pigmys from the higher elevations. It was especially interesting to examine the spongy earth at Culebra Point in a landslide; for this material is forever moving, filling up the cut at the base. It is proposed that the immense volume of water that will pass through this gap will become the force to hold back the earth. The festivities prepared for the President, the parades and native customs can only be appreciated from the natural views as caught by the camera. Nothing in the future will equal this first official inspection. President Taft, who permitted the first motion picture to pervade the sanctum of the White House, is much interested in this particular industry. He was especially anxious that the photo-reporter get a full story of the events. His frequent inquiry as to whether I was securing everything, and what I thought of this or that view, and how it would look on the screen was both encouraging to the industry and personally gratifying to me."

The recent appearance of Mary Pickford in the production of "The Good Little Devil" on the legitimate stage brought an avalanche of admirers from the motion picture ranks to the National Theatre. After each performance the stage entrance was so crowded with those anxious to get a glimpse of the charming little actress and picture play queen that Miss Pickford could scarcely make her way to the curb. A goodly portion of these stage-door admirers were those to whom the five-cent show is the limit of their extravagance for amusement. They knew Little Mary from the screen, and they wanted to see her in real flesh and blood.

J. Boyd Dexter has severed his connection with the Maryland Theatre as manager, and his place has been filled by Mr. Johnson, who is keeping up the same high standard of exhibitions that Mr. Dexter established. Several very lucrative propositions have been offered Mr. Dexter, but he has not determined exactly which he will accept. But be assured he will not leave the moving picture field.

A new film exchange will soon make its appearance in the city under the name of the Pan-American Feature Film Company, which will handle the best of the American and European markets. It will be located in the Barrister Building, with a Chicago office on Indiana avenue in that city. The president is William Airey, who as manager of the Alhambra Theatre and originator and inventor of many devices and ideas for open-air exhibitions of spectacular films is very prominent in the motion picture arena. W. A. Dawson is vice-president; G. H. Payne, secretary, and L. G. Grossman, counsel.

THE LOBBY

By S. J. Newman, Secretary and Treasurer of the Newman Manufacturing Company, Cincinnati and New York

My first article which appeared in the January 11-13 issue covered in a general way the absolute necessity of making neat and attractive lobby displays. I can not too strongly impress upon the minds of the exhibitors how vitally important the lobby is from a financial standpoint. To bear out my arguments I will relate an incident of a little more than a year ago which fits in very nicely in this article. Here goes:

One of our salesmen came to me one day and said that he had encountered the most conservative exhibitor in all his travels. This exhibitor had a very pretty theatre in an Ohio city—cost $22,000 to build—had marble front—twenty feet deep lobby—two outside flaming arcs—everything neat and attractive—except—and that's where he made his worst blunder—he would paste the posters against the marble walls. Of course, unmistakably, this spoiled the whole beauty of the lobby. In fact, it had the same effect as an onion in a violet patch. Try as our salesman might—bringing to bear every known persuasion at his command—he would not be induced to put in brass frames and easels. He would simply say in reply, "I am satisfied." "But we will improve the attendance," remonstrated the salesman, but to no avail. "This exhibitor was so obstinate—one of those unswervable kind—that I believe he would have turned me down cold if I would have offered to make him a present of the entire outfit," the salesman told me.

Thus was revealed a sad state of affairs—and an apparently impossible customer. "Look here, Davis," I said (that's the salesman's name) "you are a pretty clever sort of a chap"; (he is our best salesman) "you go right back and get that exhibitor's order." "Impossible," Davis replied, "I tried everything a man could only to get the cold shoulder every time I called, until once I became so d——d mad I was tempted to call him every name in the unprinted dictionary." "Davis, did you ever hear the story of the stubborn mule?" I asked, and upon being answered negatively I continued, "A mule pulling a dray balked in the road. The whip—even a dray stave—heavily applied by the aggrieved driver to the mule's hoary hide had as much effect as a flea biting an elephant. About this time a farmer driving his wagon happened along. Seeing the predicament of the driver and the utter contentment of the balky mule, he bethought himself a moment, then grabbed his pail, scooped down into an oats barrel, quickly carried it to within almost reaching distance of the mule's nose. The mule was smart enough to know that to eat the oats he had to reach it first, and this could only be accomplished by walking to it, and this mule kept on walking, too, because he could never quite reach that pail of oats, which was suspended on an improvised pole attached to the harness and hung immediately in front of the mule's watering, striving and hungry nostrils and mouth."

"Now, there's a weak point somewhere in that stubborn exhibitor, and the question is how to approach him," I said to Davis. "Has he the best theatre in the city?" I asked. "I think so," replied Davis, "although, quoting him, 'his attendance is equal to any two theatres combined.' There's a theatre in the next block," continued Davis, "which I believe is making rapid strides for the attendance honors. The location is not nearly so good, the theatre is not so new and has no marble lobby, but it is nevertheless neat looking. This exhibitor is very progressive, and at the time when I sold him brass frames and easels he bought them without any hesitancy, realizing the benefits he would derive out of them. He told me that last year he netted $4,600 clear profit." This information gave me an idea. "Davis," I said, "from what you tell me, I believe this progressive exhibitor does as much, if not more, business than the other fellow." "If you can prove that to be the case it will bring down the other fellow a peg and make him sit up and take notice with most startling rapidity."

To make a long story short, Davis left early the next morning, bought the first and last tickets of each of the two theatres, and by subtracting the number of the first ticket from the number of the last ticket, he was able to calculate to a nickel just how much business each exhibitor did for that day. To his amazement he found that the "little fellow" had the larger attendance to the extent of 286 tickets. Davis repeated the same method the next two days with the result that the "big fellow" was doing the least business of the two. When Davis confronted him with this evidence the exhibitor was dumbfounded and dismayed beyond all possibility of concealment. Well, Davis got his order, improved his attendance, and is to-day one of his best friends.

A remarkable picture has been recently taken by the Reliance Company, of Rodman Law and Harry Brown, the aviator, rescuing Rosanna Forbes, the actress, who was precipitated to the water through a launch explosion.

There was a bit of comedy thrown in with the tragedy, which, by the way, failed to get into the 300 feet of moving picture film. When the excitement attendant on the explosion of the launch had subsided, the body of a man was discovered hanging head downward over the side of the tugboat. It was Eddie Wynard, whom some kind friend was supporting by the legs. Eddie, with the tripod of his camera under one arm, was still turning the crank.

It is said that a splendid, clear film was obtained on this occasion by Reliance, which will be released on January 29th, entitled "Saved by Airship."

THE WILD FLOWER OF PINTO MOUNTAIN

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Frontier Release)

THE valley was filled with fog, white and billowy, and the sun, just climbing from behind the mountain, turned it into a sea of drifted snow. Gradually the shadows were dispersed and the fog dissolved as if by magic.

As the sun crept down the mountain side, revealing one by one the treasures of beauty hiding in the nooks and corners made by tree and rock, he discovered the opening of a cave.

Outside was a rude bench, an overturned basket, and an ax. A short distance away a few charred sticks were scattered, showing where a fire had been.

A man came out of the cave and stood looking over the valley. His hair was grey and his face pale and much lined, yet one would know instantly upon looking at him that he was not older than fifty That years had not aged him was very apparent. His face was tanned a very dark brown and his clothes were rough, but there was about him an unmistakable air of culture.

The man stretched his arms a little uncertainly and walked slowly to the bench, where he sat down.

A young girl appeared at the entrance of the cave. She was about fifteen years old and fresh as the newly opened flowers on the mountain side, yet with an air of womanliness about her that almost belied her years.

"Oh, how beautiful the morning is!" she exclaimed, with youthful enthusiasm.

The man did not answer and the girl went quickly to his side.

"How are you feeling, father," she asked tenderly as she put her arm around his shoulder.

"I am all right, dear, except that I feel rather weak." He patted her hand and looked up into her face. Then taking her arm from around his neck, he drew her in front of him and continued to look at her.

"How fresh and happy you look. Are you happy, little girl?" he asked

"Yes, father; why shouldn't I be happy in such a beautiful world? Only I should like you stronger."

"Don't you ever feel that you would rather live somewhere else? Don't you sometimes feel that I have wronged you by bringing you to such a place?"

"Why, father, that was so long ago I have forgotten all about it. I love these mountains and I never feel any desire for any other life. You have taught me much and I have been free and happy."

"Thank God for that," murmured the man.

"Now I am going to straighten up a bit and then go for berries. I saw such a lot of them the other side of the trail yesterday. You sit here in the sun and I'll bring you a fine lot."

She kissed her father and went into the cave. He could hear her moving about and humming softly. "Thank God for that, anyway," he murmured again.

In a short while the girl returned with a basket.

"By-by; get your mouth all fixed for some luscious berries, for I'm surely going to bring them," she said as she gave her father another kiss.

When the girl was out of sight so that the man could no longer watch her lithe figure as it swung along the path, he stretched his legs along the bench and leaned back against the rocks. With half-closed eyes he sat watching a buzzard sailing and circling over the valley.

A sudden passing pain in the region of his heart made him straighten up quickly for a moment. A troubled look came into his eyes.

That pain had bothered him a good deal lately. In the winter he had had a very severe cold which settled on his chest and it had left him very weak. Lately the pain had come.

"Poor little girl. What is to become of her?" he thought sadly. "I must tell her more of her story and prepare her for what must come soon."

His mind began to wander back over the years, and scene after scene presented itself to him. He saw his home in the East with its rich and beautiful furnishings; his young wife who so well adorned it; his baby girl who came to them the second year of their marriage. They had been so happy, he and his wife. They had had all that could be wished for, it seemed, both of material things and of blessings that last.

Then his dear one had been taken sick and all the medical power obtainable was brought to her aid.

While she lay so ill things had gone wrong in a business way, and one day he had found himself with less than one-tenth of his fortune left.

Then, in spite of every effort and care, the wife died. This was the supreme test of James Antony, and under it he failed. Just as many another man, he thought that he was strong until the test came.

Nothing was left to him, he had thought, and so life was no longer of any value. Tears ran down the brown cheeks as the weak, sad man remembered the scene. He saw himself sitting in his library, a revolver in his hand, ready to do a terrible thing. Then he remembered what he had many times thanked God for, a lisping baby voice saying, "Baby lonely. Please, papa, kiss baby." He had caught the little one to his breast and had thrown the revolver far from him.

But James Antony had not had the courage to face the altered conditions in the familiar surroundings, so he had sold everything he had left and gone as deeply into seclusion as he could. Now the question faced him whether he had done right to his daughter in so doing.

Another pain seized him and he struggled to his feet, only to fall back again across the bench.

So the girl found him when she returned with her berries.

"Father, father!" she cried in distress. One glance at his face told her the truth. She remembered having heard someone pass along the trail while she was picking berries, so she ran swiftly in that direction.

After going some distance the girl came upon two woodsmen chopping wood near the trail.

"Oh, come with me, please," she gasped out. "I fear my father is dying. Please come."

The men went with her. They lifted the man and laid him upon some blankets the girl had brought.

Slowly Antony opened his eyes and looked vacantly around him for a moment. Then his eyes cleared and he said to the men, "Do you live near?"

"Yes," answered one, "we live together in a cabin about two miles over the mountain. My name is Baker, John Baker, and his name's Leon Noble. Can we do anything for you? Is there anything you would like to ——"

"Yes," interrupted Antony. "I know that I am dying and I want you to promise me that you will care for my little girl and see that she gets back to the East. I have told her where I came from. She will be known if she says she is James Antony's daughter."

"We will do what you ask," promised Baker, and Noble seconded the promise.

Antony lay back in his daughter's arms and closed his eyes. Without opening them again he said, "My little girl, forgive me for the wrong I did you in bringing you here."

"Oh, father," said the weeping girl, "you have done no wrong to me. I love it here. Can't you stay with me?"

"No, I must go. I am very tired. Good-bye."

He sighed, and the spirit so long troubled, was free.

The men stayed at the cave that night and the next day James Antony was placed in the bosom of the mountain which had befriended him for so many years.

The girl made no objection to going with the men. She knew that was the wisest thing to do. So she took up her abode in the little cabin and went about the household duties as she had been doing in her cave. She told the two men who had befriended her that she would go East, but she wanted to wait a little while. The summer was so beautiful there that she felt she could not go.

When the leaves fell and the flowers were gone it would not be so hard.

So the days passed and she lingered on. And the longer she stayed the more the two men felt that they could not let her go. They had nicknamed her Wild Flower, and it seemed to them that her going would mean for them the going of summer.

One day John Baker returned from work a little before his friend. Wild Flower was sitting in front of the little cabin. The man threw himself down on the ground near her. "You'll want to go soon, I reckon," he said.

"No, I won't want to go, but I feel I must since my father wished it. He must have known what was best for me."

"We'll, miss you a mighty lot," said the man in a low voice.

"I'll miss you and Leon, too," she answered, "and the mountains."

"I'll miss you more than I can say, Wild Flower."

The girl did not answer.

"Do you know why?"

"Why, I suppose because you like me. I'll miss you because I like you."

"Only like me?" he asked, rising and standing over her.

Again she said nothing.

"I love you, Wild Flower, love you more than I know how to tell you," said the man passionately. "I want you to marry me. Won't you?"

There was silence, but for the man's breathing. Then the girl arose and faced him.

"I don't know very much about love," she said, "but I know I don't love you the way you mean. I love Leon just as much."

"Perhaps after a while you might."

"No, I don't think so."

But Baker, as many men before him and many after him, believed that the girl would love him, that her answer could not be final. He was content to wait a while, until a few days later he came upon Leon and Wild Flower accidentally, and surprised them so that they could not conceal the situation. But he knew his rival was no more successful than he had been. However, this did not lessen his jealousy.

The next morning the two men started to their work as usual. When they were well out of sight of the cabin, Baker turned to Leon suddenly, almost fiercely.

"Do you love Wild Flower?" he asked.

"Yes, I do," was the reply. "I ask you the same question."

"I love her, and I must have her," answered Baker.

"We can't both have her."

"Then we must fight for her."

Leon did not answer, but at once laid down his axe and took off his coat. Baker did the same. In a moment they had gripped each other and the fight was begun.

With a woman's intuition the girl felt sure, when she saw the two men leave the cabin, that all was not well. Soon after they had left she started in the direction they had taken.

When she came upon them, for an instant her heart stood still. They were fighting with the strength of wild beasts, their friendship of years fast turning to hatred, as they fought.

Quickly the girl realized the situation. "Stop!" she cried, trying to force them apart.

Something dropped from John's neck to the ground. Wild Flower picked it up and examined it. It was a rosary which had been broken in the fight. The girl knew what it was, for her father had shown her one which he wore because it had belonged to her mother. She again went to the young men and held the beads up before them. "I command you to stop," she cried. "You will gain nothing. I do not love either of you and never will."

The men released their hold and fell apart. When their eyes met those of the girl they turned away in shame.

"You may well be ashamed," she said. "You fight over me as though I were a beast. Worse than that, you expect the winner to claim me as his just reward. Why, even the females of the woods have the right to choose their mates. I have watched them many times, and from the squirrels to the mountain lions, the female has the right to choose. Surely I should have the same right. I am an ignorant, uneducated girl in many respects, but I know that that is true." She paused and looked sadly at the men. "Now," she continued, "I want you both to stay here and not follow me. Before I came to live with you, you were good friends. I am going away and you can be good friends again."

"Wild Flower!" exclaimed both the men at once.

"Please do not try to stop me, I am going."

"But where?" asked Baker.

"I shall go to the convent in the town. The sisters will care for me until I can go East. I know about them. Father told me. Good-bye."

The girl turned and slowly went back along the trail to the cabin. The two men stood gazing after her as though turned to stone. After they had stood so for some minutes, even after she had gone from sight, Leon turned slowly and looked at Baker.

"John," he said, "I think we are two of the most contemptible cusses I know, to bring this into that little girl's life."

"You're right," answered John, "and the worst of it is that we can't help matters now."

"No, but we can do what she told us to and be friends again. Will you?"

John held out his hand and the two men turned to their neglected work.

So many letters have come to the News asking my criticism of enclosed scenarios, also requests to show how a scenario should be written; how to write the synopsis; how to put the scenes in form, etc. All this takes time—more than I have available. Complying with so many requests, in lieu of the story next week, Miss Virginia West will write a Model Scenario, for would-be writers. Extra copies will be printed and can be obtained for 10 cents each. Others will follow. So do not lose this opportunity. SUBSCRIBE NOW.—(Editor M. P. N.)

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc.., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

In the Patent Office Commissioner Moore reports conditions as fairly good considering the great handicap represented by the insufficient force, and inadequate salaries, and the want of sufficient room and proper equipment. He bemoans the fact that Congress during the last year has failed to make any provision for increase in salaries of employees and force, and reiterates the recommendation contained in previous reports with reference to the necessity for a further recognition of the high-grade work done by the Examining Corps. He calls attention to the exceptional conditions that prevail in his office, not only by reason of the fact that the office is self-supporting, but chiefly because of the fact that the trained examiners are in great demand with prominent firms and business trusts, and that it is the rule, rather than the exception, that when a man is sufficiently experienced and trained to become of value to the Patent Office and inventors and patentees alike he receives an offer of higher compensation from the outside. This exodus of a trained class of men necessarily has a tendency to reduce the average efficiency of the corps, so that it is a difficult task to maintain a proper standard for the expeditious and successful conduct of public business. Obviously the moving picture art and trade has to suffer with other branches of industry, and it behooves the readers of the News to use their influence with their congressional representatives to the end that the Patent Office may receive fair consideration and relief, in the interests of all concerned.

Cinematograph is meeting with favor in the Philippines. The publicity committee of the Manila Merchants' Association has completed plans for a film of the city of Manila. The tobacco industry of the city will be one of the chief industries that will be shown in detail. A film of the mining industry of the Philippines will be taken later.

Patent No. 1,048,379, issued to Alva S. Warren of Batavia, N. Y., relates to devices involving reels or spools for receiving a strip bearing pictures that may be brought into view successively, and is designed to provide an improved and novel construction wherein a plurality of supporting and guiding devices are so arranged that a strip bearing pictures on opposite faces thereof may be so moved as to exhibit the pictures on either side of the strip or film. In carrying out the invention the supporting structure is adapted to be reversed by bodily inverting the same, according to whether the pictures on one side or the other of the film are to be viewed. Claim is made to a picture exhibiting device adapted to stand with either end uppermost, comprising two frames, unjointed links uniting the frames at each side and pivotally connected therewith, the said links ranging diagonally to the horizontal center of the frames, articulated links comprising shorter and longer members pivotally united with each other, and pivotally united with the frames at approximately the horizontal center of the latter, a spool near one end of one frame, a spool near the opposite end of the other frame, a guide roller on each frame at opposite ends, and a flexible exhibiting strip, the ends of which are secured to the spools, said strip passing from the spool of one frame over the guide on said frame diagonally to the guide on the opposite frame, and thence to the spool of said opposite frame, the said spools being mounted to turn in the frame and provided with means to turn said spools.

Patent No. 1,047,915 to David S. Cole, of Washington, Iowa, relates to photographic shutters of the pneumatically operated type, and is designed to afford a shutter mechanism which will be very light of movement, wherein friction will be greatly eliminated, and having means for stopping the shutter at each end of its stroke. The device consists of a front board comprising a pair of spaced members having opposed apertures, one of said apertures further having a downward triangular extension terminating in an arcuate corner, a shutter slidable between said members to cover said apertures, an air tube mounted upon said front board, and having its upper end slightly spaced therefrom, a stop beneath said air tube having an arcuate seat, a plunger slidable in said air tube, a link having its upper end pivoted to said plunger, and its lower end adapted to engage the seat of said stop, a second link having its lower end pivoted to said shutter and adapted to engage the arcuate lower corner when depressed, and an S-shaped lever having its ends pivoted respectively to said links and its center to said board.

"Some there be that shadows kiss,

'Tis folly to be wise."

TRADE-MARKS are becoming an important factor in the motion picture art and industry, and picture-playgoers are learning to size up and classify the films by their distinctive symbols of production, a fact which we have noted on various occasions, especially in the higher class electric theatres. This is as it should be. Let the film trade-mark become a veritable symbol of "Good Will," a guarantee of moral faith on the part of the producer analogous to a guarantee under the Pure Food and Drug Law, so that the mere exhibitor and observer may be absolved from all blame, and the responsibility for inferior or questionable production rest where it properly belongs. This will not only protect the public but the producer as well, and render his mark a valuable asset. As a matter of fact certain well-known trade-marks have become so valuable as to entirely overshadow all other business assets, it being estimated that the aggregate value of well-known American trade-marks must reach into hundreds of millions of dollars.

fact is well known that the ultra-violet rays of the spectrum are totally invisible to the human eye, although highly effective in photography. Nevertheless it has been found that the ultra-violet rays may be used to advantage to increase the resolving power of the microscope. Hence a kind of artificial eye has been devised for focusing and adjusting the image, consisting of an eye lens of crystal glass, and a retina of fluorescent glass. The image formed on this retina by the ultra-violet rays can be examined visually through an ordinary lens. The fluorescent light, however, is injurious to the natural eye, and this method of examination must be sparingly used.

Patent No. 1,049,182 issued to Robert L. Watkins, a resident of the Borough of Manhattan, City, County and State of New York relates to picture micrographic projecting apparatus, the main object of the invention being the provision of means for reflecting magnified images, the device being especially adapted to the use of physicians in the examination of blood, etc. Other objects of the invention are the reflection of the magnified image from the microscope in such manner that the observer can view the reflection while sitting upright, without bending over as is customary in microscopic work; the mounting of the apparatus upon and in connection with an enclosing desk having a movable top; the provision of special adjustments for the condensing lens and reflector used in projecting a beam of light through the microscope and into the camera; and last, but not least, the provision of apparatus of the type mentioned which may be used in taking enlargements of microscopic objects which are in motion, in a moving picture machine, so that the movements of microscopic animal organisms may be viewed on a vastly magnified scale by large audiences.

"It can be demonstrated that the patent system is the most important feature of our government."

"Many who have hitherto approved the objectionable bills or sections because of lack of information seem now to appreciate better the value of the patent system. These men admit, after strenuous argument, in some cases fairly, in some cases grudgingly, that nearly all the familiar facilities of daily life are the outcome of invention developing through patents. Wherever invention has permeated an art the comfort of living has been amazingly advanced, the cost of living accordingly reduced. It has been shown, for example, that but for invention looking to the reward of patents, the whole world—every man, woman and child—would to-day be engrossed in a desperate struggle to secure even the bare necessities of life."

HALLBERG'S NEW TICKET COUNTING AND DISPENSING MACHINE

Every amusement place using roll tickets of any standard make, and especially those conducting motion picture theatres, where the standard roll of 2,000 tickets in varying prices is used, will be interested in the device illustrated herewith.

This illustration shows the Hallberg ticket counting and dispensing machine, within which may be placed a standard roll of tickets in a few seconds' time. After the roll has been put in, the device is closed to the operator by a lock, who which the manager or proprietor only carries the key. By the action of a single lever, operated with one hand by the ticket seller, the machine automatically takes one ticket from the roll, counts it on an automatic continuous register, just the same as a cash register would do. After the ticket has been counted, it is pushed through an opening in front of the dispenser, where it is discharged and picked up by the purchaser.

The use of this machine makes it unnecessary for the ticket seller to tear off or handle a single ticket. The customer or purchaser soon becomes accustomed to receiving the tickets directly from the mouth of the machine, which absolutely prevents the reselling of tickets and keeps an accurate account under lock and key of every ticket sold.

The machine is heavily and simply constructed, is of artistic design and occupies very little room, requiring only a space 8¾ inches high, 14 inches long and 3 inches wide. Where tickets of more than one price are sold, two machines can be installed, one on either side of the window opening, and the speed at which the tickets can be delivered is many times the possibility of the seller making change; as a matter of fact, more than 150 tickets a minute have been dispensed on test. The design is perfect and attractive and the finish is high-class throughout. They are available at the present time in either oxidized copper or nickel finish, and we recommend that readers of the Moving Picture News communicate with Mr. J. H. Hallberg, 36 East Twenty-third street, New York, for the purchase of these machines

The picture business has proved a veritable bonanza to the Indians of the Western reservations.

The demand by Western film makers for real redskins has largely solved the problem of tobacco and firewater.

The foremost producers of Indian and Western dramas in the world, the Kay-Bee and Broncho companies, owned by Messrs. Kessel & Baumann, have a large number of Indians under service. Over one hundred Sioux Indians from the Pine Ridge Reservation are working for them, and with every five a chief is required. The Indians receive from $7 to $10 per week and their expenses, while the chiefs are responsible for their various bands and are paid from $10 to $12 per week.

THE MYSTERIES OF THE ROSARY

There is being made in America now one of the greatest features which has been seen in this country, covering the field which has been covered in the past by such pictures as "The Holy City" and "The Passion Play." This feature is being produced in three reels and will be released through the well-known concern, Union Features. The title is "The Mysteries of the Rosary." This will undoubtedly be one of the big successes of the year. Over 200 people were employed with the splendid cast of leading characters and gorgeous settings. The release date will be announced very shortly.

SPECIAL EVENT FILM MANUFACTURING COMPANY

Mr. Beck is now leaving for Elmira and Utica to take some pictures of the institutions' inmates and local views for his educational series. His little camera will soon be on the market, and you will be able to take the picture and print it with the same machine. Mr. Beck has covered over 10,000 miles since the first of January in search of interesting subjects for educational purposes. He is one of the most experienced traveling camera men in the United States, and while on his travels is always on the lookout for new subjects.

The Special Event Film Company has a new tripod, panorama and tilt which they are placing on the market at a very reasonable price.

"BUFFALO" JONES

Col. Charles J. Jones is making his last appearance on the lecture platform, before giving up his lecture work and retiring to a well earned rest. He will appear for three lectures at Carnegie Hall on Monday evening, January 27th, Wednesday afternoon and Wednesday evening January 29th, matinee 3:30 and evenings at 8:30, where he will deliver his lecture on the Most Daring Hunt Expedition the world has ever known. Lassoing Wild Animals in Africa. Those of our readers to whom Buffalo Jones is well known, and who would like to pay him a farewell visit, are advised to avail themselves of these last opportunities.

SCREEN CLUB BALL

The Screen Club ball will be held on Saturday evening, April 19th, at Terrace Garden, Fifty-eighth street and Lexington avenue.

In the place of the usual motion picture entertainment, the club will give a white face minstrel performance in which the leading stars and players of the picture play world will take part. Mr. William Robert Daly is in charge of this entertainment and is ready to receive suggestions from any and all members of the club.

The program is in charge of Mr. Charles Abrams, who has already contracted with many of the leading manufacturers who have taken space in the pages of the booklet.

Mr. Jules Bernstein has charge of the sale of the boxes, which are being sold at $50 each.

Tickets to the entertainment and ball will be sold at $2.00 each, admitting a gentleman and a lady, extra lady's tickets to cost $1.00 each, when the lady is accompanied by a gentleman or is one of a party.

The ball will undoubtedly be the most successful affair of its kind in the history of the motion picture world, and it is anticipated that several thousand dollars will be realized. This fund will lay the foundation for the building of a permanent clubhouse

Any communication regarding the ball may be addressed to the corresponding secretary, Mr. Calder Johnstone, and will receive immediate attention.

THE OPEN ROAD
(Reliance for January 22nd.)

The Reliance two-reel release for January 22nd, under review at the present writing, presents a drama which was written by Forrest Halsey. The story, although not in any way unusual, has been very nicely played by the Reliance players.

The centrepiece of the story is the son of a millionaire. This son of a millionaire falls in love with and marries a chorus girl, is disowned therefor by his father, and is deserted by his brilliant choice when she discovers that he is penniless. Having nothing to which he can turn his hand for a living, the young man falls in with a tramp and takes to the open road. Life in the open tends to make him strong and muscular in body; so much so that when he comes across a traveling company of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" players and falls in love with another pretty actress, he is able to knock his rival out in the first round.

The father of the young man sends a detective after him, who, upon meeting with him, gives him a bit of news that is welcome, namely, that the woman he had married had been already the wife of another man. He therefore immediately marries the little actress of the traveling company. His father, hearing this, although he has relentingly sent for his son, now refuses to receive him.

The old man, however, falls sick, and an item which catches the son's eye appears in the papers, stating the necessity of the transfusion of blood from some healthy man in order to save the life of the old millionaire. The son straightway steps in and, becoming the savior of the old man's life, is taken again to his father's heart, along with his pretty young wife.

VITAGRAPH

HOW FATTY MADE GOOD, by Ralph Ince (Jan. 31).—Hughie is one of those fat, good-natured country boys, in love with a girl. His rival is a thin, lanky youth by the name of Zeb. Hughie falls from the good graces of the girl when he falls out of the apple tree, trying to get an apple for the girl. Zeb happens along and, fortunately for him, happens to have an apple which he hands to the girl. They leave Hughie sitting on the ground, sore at himself and all the world.

A show hits town, starring one of those cheap Shakespearean ham actors. Zeb gets a couple of tickets and takes the girl, Lucy, to see the shoy. Lucy flirts with the leading actor. Lucy gets Zeb to take her to the back door after the show. The actor comes out, he recognizes Lucy and invites her to have an ice cream soda. She accepts. They both exit, leaving Zeb in the same frame of mind as they left Hughie. Lucy falls for the cheap flattery of the actor, who is swelled up over his success and inveigles Lucy to elope with him.

While all this is going on, Hughie, who has had it in for Zeb for stealing his girl, meets an old friend, a prizefighter, who is training for a bout. He receives boxing instructions from him and becomes quite handy in the art of self-defense. He goes looking for Zeb, but happens to come across the actor planning to elope with Lucy. He makes up his mind to throttle the scheme. He overhears the actor engage a cabby to meet him after the show and drive Lucy and him to the station. Hughie is there on time, and when the actor and the girl enter the carriage he quickly jumps on the seat, whips up the horse and drives off. Instead of driving them to the station, he drives them into the country to a lonely spot. He opens the carriage door. The actor indignantly demands an explanation and he gets it in the shape of a good licking from Hughie. Lucy, by this time, realizes her position. She gratefully thanks Hughie for rescuing her from an awful fate and becomes his only own.

LUBIN

THE HOUSE IN THE WOODS, by Eleanor Talbot Kinkead (Jan. 31).—Major Morris, a country gentleman, has an adopted daughter, Marian Lane, to whom he proposes to leave his fortune. His nephew, George Harris, is in love with Marian, but more particularly with her prospective wealth. Marian is beautiful. Wishing to obtain a portrait of her, Morris engages a young artist, Alfred Earle. The picture is painted in the style of a famous masterpiece. A speedy attachment springs up between Marian and Earle. George, jealous, comes upon Marian's picture one day, at its completion and, taking a knife, riddles it. He only precipitates matter. Earle declares his love, the major consents, and Earle and Marian are married. The major gives them a pretty bungalow on his estate called "The House in the Woods." They take possession, and for a time all goes well. Then George begins the machinations whereby he effects an estrangement between his uncle and Marian. A famous portrait in the major's library mysteriously disappears. George, who has himself stolen it, convinces his uncle that it was taken by Earle and sold for a large sum. Morris, indignant, accuses Earle. Earle, equally indignant, denies, and he and Marian, deeply wounded, leave "The House in the Woods." Five years later. Earle, unsuccessful, is living with his wife and child in a garret, but struggling heroically. George sends a false telegram to his uncle saying Marian is dead. The major turns to George for solace, and makes him his heir. George now enters upon a life of depravity which hurries him to an untimely end. Meanwhile, Marian seeing that Earle is breaking under the strain, decides to take their little boy and secretly return to "The House in the Woods" hoping for a reconciliation with Morris. One day, while Earle is working, unobserved she slips off with the child. She goes to "The House in the Woods." Rumors spread that the place is "haunted." Morris, seeking an explanation, offers Sam, his negro butler, ten dollars to spend the night there. The negro agrees, and, comfortably settled, is enjoying a supper when the door opens and a white robed figure stands on the threshold. Sam makes a dash for the window and disappears. Determined to solve the mystery, the next night Morris himself goes to the little house. As he reads he falls asleep. The door opens. A beautiful child enters, approaches and lays its hand on the major's knee. Startled, the major wakes. Again the door opens. Marian enters, she goes timidly toward him. Before he realizes that she is not a spirit, a carriage arrives, Earle springs out, enters, and rushes to his wife and child. He has sold his great picture and is rich and famous. He hands the major a letter. It is a dying confession of George's guilt and of Earle's innocence. Morris reads the letter and grasps the hand of Earle. He draws Marian to him, tenderly kisses her and, reaching down, lifts the child in his arms.

CRYSTAL

ACCIDENT INSURANCE (Feb. 9).—Pearl White opens an office in Red Dog, Nevada, as an agent of the Quick Pay Accident Insurance Company. She goes out for business. She makes herself known to all the miners in town and awaits their applications. The first to call is Chester. He gets insured and, a little later, accidentally shoots himself in the arm. He collects his insurance money and tells all the boys of his good fortune. Instantly there is a rush of business, and Pearl is swamped with applications. She issues policies to all. Then the men devise schemes to get hurt. One rolls down the mountain side; another shoots himself in the arm; still another trifles with a box of dynamite, and so on down the line, until there is not a man in town who cannot boast of some injury. They anxiously await the money from the main office, and are somewhat dismayed when Pearl receives a letter from the main office of the company that it has failed, and that they cannot collect. Pearl is in a fair way to being mobbed when Chester, who has taken quite a fancy to her, rescues her, and the men have naught to do but to congratulate the pair on their approaching wedding festival.

On the same reel:

HER LADY FRIEND.—Belmont pays attention to Miss Alden. When he calls she is entertaining her friend, Miss Pounds, a man-chasing old maid. She immediately claims Belmont as her own, and he cannot shake her. He hits upon a scheme to make his friend Slick, a promoter, the recipient of Miss Pounds' attentions, but Slick is all for Miss Allen. Miss Pounds is informed that her aunt has left her a fortune of $5,000, and Belmont apprises Slick of this fact, telling him that he can get her to invest it in his schemes. Slick, however, fools Belmont by writing a note to Miss Pounds, telling her that she has been left $50,000 instead of $5,000, and leaves the letter where Belmont can see it. Belmont immediately rushes to Miss Pounds' home, and, proposing to her, is accepted. Slick, meanwhile has proposed to Miss Alden, and when Belmont and Miss Pounds call on Miss Allen they find Slick there. They explain that they are engaged, so do Slick and Miss Alden, and Belmont cannot understand the hilarious laughter that greets his announcement of his engagement to Miss Pounds, due to Slick's little trick.

REX

HIS SISTER (Feb. 9).—George Halsey associates with evil companions, but manages to keep the knowledge of it from his sister, with whom he is living, both being orphans.

George commits a theft and is arrested and convicted. The sister, in order to get away from the disgrace, goes to a small country town and becomes a professional nurse.

She becomes acquainted with Phillips Moore, a minister, while nursing his sister through an illness. Their friendship ripens into love, and later, when Phillips proposes marriage, she accepts.

George, on being released from jail, takes up his old life. He comes to the same town where his sister is living, and makes an attempt at robbing the minister's house. He is surprised in his act, but manages to make his escape, but is shot. He evades his pursuers, but the loss of blood from his wound renders him unconscious. He is found by his sister. She takes him into her home. He stays there until he has recovered from his wounds, his presence being kept a secret.

Some gossiping neighbors find out that George is in the house, and the tongue of scandal starts wagging. The news reaches the minister's ears, and he goes to Lois' house to ascertain the truth. The sister, fearing that if her brother is recognized it would cause his arrest, denies his presence in the house. The minister, knowing that Lois is untruthful, misconstrues her motive. He leaves the house and decides to break off their engagement.

George realizes that his sister has lost the man she loves in order to protect him. His manhood asserts itself. He goes to the minister, makes a confession to him, explaining all to the minister's satisfaction. The minister and Lois are brought together again. The brother leaves them after vowing to lead a better life.

THE STRIKE-BREAKERS (Feb. 7).—Roy, an easy-going young man, is persuaded by Milly to wake up and show his mettle. He is made sheriff and Milly accepts him. Her father, Mr. Carston, is the manager of some profitable mines, and his foreman, Larsen, has hopes of marrying Milly. He starts to propose to her, but she shows him her ring and tells him she is engaged to Roy. Larsen is embittered and his sullen nature calls for vengeance upon the woman who threw him over.

His chance arrives when Mr. Carston goes to an adjoining town to get the money from the bank for the payroll. The weather has been bad, and the stream is swollen, and the bridge has been destroyed. Mr. Carston is obliged to fume and fuss.

The miners finish work for the day. They cross the small bridge which spans a chasm, and which leads from the mines to the miners' cabins and the paymaster's office, and go to get their money. They are informed that the payroll is delayed, Mr. Carston not having returned, and are asked to call back later.

Larsen seizes the opportunity to inflame the miners. He tells them that Carston is trying to beat them out of their wages, and incites them to demand their money at once. Milly overhears this and, sending a messenger to Roy, she rides off to see what has happened to the stage. She rides hard and comes to the opposite side of the stream. She explains the desperate situation, and Mr. Carston throws her the bag across the stream. She gets it and hurries off as the stage driver and passengers start to construct a temporary bridge across the stream.

In the meantime the men have gotten beyond control. They smash the paymaster's office and disarm and capture two deputies sent ahead by Roy. Roy arrives and warns the miners to hold off, but as they press forward, he spurs to the bridge, and setting his horse free, he draws his revolvers and tells the men that he will kill the first man who sets foot upon the bridge. He cowes the miners, but one throws a rock, badly injuring Roy, who staggers and supports himself by holding on to the bridge rail. The man follows it up and jumps on to the bridge, and Roy promptly kills him. The crowd surges back as Milly dashes up behind Roy, holding the black bag on high and crying she has the wages.

The miners are ashamed and vent their feelings upon Larsen, who is rescued by Roy, who will not give in until he has marched his man safely to jail. He then collapses. His reward is the adoration of Milly and the thanks of her parents.

FRONTIER

THE BRANDED SIX-SHOOTER (Feb. 5).—In the little town of Martinez, N. M., lived two brothers, Buck and Dave Conners, who were unfortunate enough to love the same girl, Ruby Howard, the daughter of a rich rancher, but Ruby shows her preference for the elder brother, Buck, which causes jealousy to spring up in the heart of Dave. While in this mood he is accosted by a casual acquaintance, a low-browed Mexican vaquero, who, seeing the mood that Dave is in, takes advantage of it and takes him over to the village saloon, where they meet Jack Saunders, a man of bad repute, who has been mixed up in quite a number of flimsy deals. Through the influence of Saunders and Pedro, the Mexican, Dave agrees to carry out a little job. He agrees to meet them at a certain time at a spot known as the "hole in the rock." He leaves them and goes home. In the meantime Pedro has had a little trouble with an Indian. The Indian leaves him with revenge in his heart. Dave, very sulky over his experience at the post-office, where Ruby showed her preference for his brother, arrives home, and his dear old mother asks him to come in for supper, and he, in a nasty mood, refuses. Buck, his brother, who has arrived home previous to that, takes his mother into the house to partake of their supper. Left alone with his own thoughts, Dave discovers that his brother, Buck, has left his six-shooter and holster hanging on the wall. Dave, in his jealous anger, sees his chance to repay his brother for winning Ruby's affections. He steals his brother's gun, which is branded on the handle with his name. He goes to the appointed place to meet Pedro and Saunders, and while they are laying their plans they are overheard by the Indian, who rushes into the village and informs the sheriff of what they intend to do.

The afternoon stage of the Tijeras-Jemez line, which passes through a little town, Martinez, is on its down trip, and Dave, with his two evil companions, carry out their plans, Dave leaving his brother's gun purposely on the ground so that the blame will fall upon his brother. The stage arrives at the post-office and Ruby's father and mother, who have been up to Albuquerque on business, tell Ruby what has happened and inform her that her sweetheart, Buck Conners, is guilty of the crime because his gun was found by the horse's head. Ruby does not really believe this, although it stings her to the heart to think that her sweetheart may be guilty of such a thing. She leaves her father and mother and goes to Buck's home, calls his brother to the door, and tells him that Buck is arrested for the crime. While Dave is listening to her he accidentally gives himself away, and she flatly accuses him of doing the job and laying the blame on Buck. She begs and implores him to save his brother, and a good streak of manhood comes to Dave. He leaves Ruby and goes to the spot where the loot is hidden and decides to bring it back to the sheriff. While there, Pedro and Saunders come upon him. He holds them up at the point of the gun and forces them to carry the loot into the village, and turns them over to the sheriff, telling him that it was not his brother, Buck, who committed the crime, but him. Dave afterwards is released for turning state's evidence, and he goes to Ruby's house, where he finds his brother. He asks their forgiveness, gives them his blessing, and leaves them to enjoy their love and be happy.

POWERS

THEIR MUTUAL FRIEND (Feb. 7).—David Rush, a wealthy young clubman, has entrusted his funds to his bosom friend, Phil Stewart, a Wall Street operator. Suffering from ennui, David goes to the Stewarts' home for a change. He is warmly welcomed by Mrs. Stewart, with whom David is an old-time friend and favorite.

Stewart's great coup has proven to be a failure, and whilst he has saved his own neck to a large extent, he has sacrificed David's money and he is virtually ruined.

David's sister gets the news before he does and wires him. Appalled at the sudden disaster, David asks if the news is true, and Stewart admits it is so. The men quarrel and, goaded to madness, David attacks his erstwhile friend. They are separated and David threatens to kill Stewart.

Another coup is successful and, at Mrs. Stewart's solicitation, Stewart recoups David's losses and he visits their family again. The hazardous life Stewart had led has told upon his nerves and when Mrs. Stewart gives him a list of her liabilities he flies into a terrible passion and strikes her. He hits her in a vulnerable place and she falls and he is unable to revive her. Shocked out of his reason, Stewart shoots himself.

David finds the bodies and, remembering his threat to kill Stewart and fearing he will be arrested, he leaves, but is seen by friends. The bodies are found, suspicion points to David, and he is arrested. He is submitted to the awful third degree—the only surviving atrocity of the Inquisition period. Unable to stand the strain of the brutal questioning, he succumbs and says he committed the awful deed. At the trial his senses are deadened and he scarcely listens to the damning evidence. Suddenly an invalid is wheeled into court. He insists upon a hearing. He tells how he sat at his window and saw the Stewart tragedy. He describes the incidents as they happened and explains how he sank back unconscious from the shock.

David is freed and returns to his world with his character unsmirched.

When she is told that the old miser, Jenkins, is downstairs, waiting to propose to her, she upsets everything grahs a lot of dirty clothes, and rushes into the kitchen and starts washing. Old Jenkins, on seeing what a worker she is, rubs his hands in glee, motions for the old folks to leave, and proposes to her, and rushes off for a minister. When the miser returns with the minister, the daughter is all dolled up, but still at the tubs washing. The marriage is performed, and the miser takes his bride to his home, shows her the kitchen, and piles of dirty dishes to he washed. She turns on him, refuses to clean them, knocks them out of his hands, and makes it rather warm for him. Then she goes into the sitting-room, and is disgusted with the tumhle-down lookin~ furniture, and goes to a large furniture store and orders a lot of swell furniture. The furniture men have just arrived with all the furniture as Jenkins is just returning from Brown's, where he has com--plained of the daughter's laziness. On seeing the furniture he throws a fit, makes the men take the furniture away, and kicks his wife into the house. She goes into the sitting-room, sits hy the window and, while there, sees the old miser at his treasure, which he has hidden in the garden. When he leaves she sneaks out and takes some of the money and goes to the furniture store, tells them to return the furniture, and this time, when the old miser sees the furniture, he suspects that his wife has discovered the treasure's hiding place, and rushes out. He discovers the loss and rushes hack to her to demand it hack. She hits him over the head with a picture, and kicks him out of the room.

Some days later she has given a dinner, and invited her folks, the furniture movers, etc., and compelled the old miser to wait on them. He had the nerve to serve the soup in a washbowl, which so angered his wife that she throws it all over him, the rest of the company driving him back into the kitchen with a shower of plates, which completely wrecks the place, upsetting cans of paint, dishes, and an enormous pumpkin on his head. He makes a hurried getaway, by dashing out the window with a chair and making a high dive out.

THE LATENT SPARK (Jan. 27).—The last installment of the mortgage was due on James Crosby's place and he had not the funds to meet it. Crosby's daughter, Sallie, sacrificed all she had and still a $10 deficit remained. And then Ed Wilbur, ranchhand, came forth with his last penny and added to the little pile, making just enough to clear the mortgage. Sallie felt warmly toward him hut, a day later, looking into the yard, she saw Johnston, a hurly mountain renegade, knock Ed down, and when he rose Johnston knocked him down again. Johnston, sneering from the yard, called hack to her, pointing derisively at the prostrate Ed. Later the mountain renegade stole the mortgage funds. The family saw him do it and were powerless. Ed, coming up, saw, and Johnston, with a laugh, felled him, mounted his horse and was off. And then rose the latent spirit in Ed. Leaping to his own horse, he gave pursuit. He reached the fast-traveling thief, closed with him and the joy came at last to Ed. Furiously they struggled and the thief was hauled hodily from his saddle and the money taken from him and the former coward, now hero, rode hack in triumph to his sweetheart.

THE DOCTOR'S LOVE AFFAIR (Feb. 1).—Dr. Pierre, who lives in a palatial home surrounded hy fragrant flowers and stately trees, has a great admiration for white geraniums. One day a new object of admiration comes into his life—a charming young woman, Louise, who is first seen hy him walking in the neighhor's garden. Love begins to burn in his heart. As a token of affection he sends her a large white geranium, which is received very coldly, much to his sorrow. Still hopeful, he persists in sending her flowers, each time failing to receive encouragement.

Louise is suddenly taken ill. Dr. Pierre is summoned at once and faithfully cares for her until recovery, after which his heart is greatly troubled over the continued attentions of another suitor. Finally, completely discouraged hy an unsuccessful proposal, the doctor sails to a distant country.

One day, soon after his arrival, he is very much surprised to find one of his favorite flowers upon a tahle in his new home, and is completely overcome with joy when the lady he loves enters the room exclaiming, "See where love has led me!"

A SERENADE BY PROXY (Jan. 29).—Colonel Jackson, a well-to-do farmer, forbids young Thomas, a neighbor's son, to have any further communication with his daughter Muriel.

Considering her own romance shattered, Muriel lends herself to helping Zeb Hawkins, the chore boy, in winning the affections of Molly, the housemaid, whose head has been completely turned by constantly reading sensational novels. She refuses to consider Zeb as a suitor hecause he is not romantic enough.

Muriel advises Zeb to emulate Molly's idea of a lover by serenading her. Zeb is anything but musical, so he gets a phonograph, points the horn towards Molly's window that night and grinds out "Love Me and the World is Mine" to such purpose that her heart is melted. Unfortunately Molly does not possess a singing voice but she induces Muriel to do the singing for her while she, Molly, stands at the open window and makes appropriate gestures. Soon after Molly accepts Zeb as her future husband, hut not until he agrees to elope with her.

The night of the elopement Zeb comes cautiously down the ladder with Molly's telescope bag, and young Thomas, who happens along, mistakes him for a hurglar. Anxious to cover himself with glory in the eyes of Muriel's father he attacks the supposed hurglar in the dark and a rough and tumhle fight ensues in which Molly joins. Muriel, hearing the rumpus, hastens down the ladder just as Zeh and Molly streak it across the lawn.

Thomas and Muriel recognize each other at the foot of the ladder, and hy this time Colonel Jackson arrives on the scene. He accuses the young people of eloping, and in vain do they try to convince the irate father to the contrary. Under the stress of circumstances the spirit of Thomas awakens and he boldly tells the Colonel that he may as well have the game as the name and runs off with Muriel, pursued by her father. Joining Zeb and Molly they drive to the nearest clergyman, who has an unexpected douhle wedding on his hands.

VICTOR

PERCY H. BALDWIN—TRIFLER (Feb.—Little Elsie Norris was the pride of her older sister, Jane. After the death of their mother Jane had taken the household cares upon her and mothered her young sister. Elsie held a position as a cashier in a restaurant near by and was much admired by her patrons for her kind ways and willingness and cheerfulness at all times. One day a very handsome young man came into the restaurant. He met some friends of his in the restaurant and asked to he introduced to the little cashier. Of course Elsie was pleased to meet Dr. Baldwin, as she learned his name to be, and from the heginning of their acquaintance there was a mutual feeling of admiration.

Percy H. Baldwin, as he signed his name to his famous paintings, as he was a successful artist, lived in luxurious bachelor apartments connected with his studio. He had a model who had suited him very well until he met Elsie, and then no one suited him. He dismissed his model one morning when she appeared at the regular time—he was uneasy, and then decided to go ask the girl at the restaurant to pose for him. At first she did not want to, but when he made things look bright for her—she consented. Thus many happy days were spent, and at the end of the picture she was paid for her services. Elsie felt that she was rich, and was happy when she went home to her father and sister with all the money. He felt sorry for the pretty iittle girl and bought her a pretty dress also, so that she might look like other girls. Alas, when she arrived home her father denounced her—his old-fashioned ideas were that it was not the proper employment and urged her to give up her position. She hated to do it and when she refused to, he ordered her to do so. Heartsick and discouraged over her failure Elsie went back to the artist and told him. He would not hear of it and it was then that he confessed his love for her and asked her to marry him. Finally she consented and after she had written a note telling her father that she would keep her position—they were married. On account of his folks his parents were not to be told and the marriage kept a secret. He furnished a beautiful little home for her and he retained his old apartments. Thus things went along happily for a long while.

In the meantime, Jane and her father hunted for Elsie—and at last the father died. One day Jane, all in mourning, ran against Elsie in the street. It was not until then that Elsie learned of her father's death and took Jane home with her.

When Percy came to visit his bride he was stunned by the beauty of the sister, Jane. Her beauty caused lots of unhappiness, for then and there he made love to Jane, and she, not knowing he was married, was horrified when Elsie walked into the room, saw them and denounced him. Elsie throws her beautiful jewels and all his presents in his face and, with Jane, she went back to her humble home. There her husband followed her—pleading with her to return to him but, although it almost broke her heart, she refused. There in bitterest sorrow he left her—not broken in spirit by her refusal, for out of doors he met an old sweetheart of his and off they went for a spin in his auto—for Percy H. Baldwin, a trifler, as he might be called, would soon find happiness in another's face.

THE HOUSE ON THE PLAINS.—A good-looking young miner, visiting his sweetheart in her home on the plains, is ordered out by the girl's father—both protest, but father is firm in his decision. The young girl slips her lover a note, stating she will fire two shots "when dad is gone." Several miners enter the store and leave their savings with the old man, who puts a bag of money in the safe. Two Mexicans sneak into the scene and watch as the miners leave. They determine to break the safe and secure the money.

When the coast is clear they enter the store and ask for merchandise. As the old man starts to get the goods they knock him insensible and prepare for their work.

The young girl in her room, at the rear of the store, is preparing to meet her sweetheart, and she hears her father fall to the floor. Cautiously she goes to the door and is horrified to see him bound and gagged.

She is quick-witted and jumps from the window to the ground below, goes to the corral, mounts her horse, and rides for assistance to her lover and friends. The Mexicans hear her ride off, rush out and fire two shots, both shots missing aim. The Mexicans return to the cabin, revive the old man and demand the combination of the safe. He refuses, and they determine to blow the safe up with dynamite. They start the fuse going, and are about to exit when they hear the sound of horses' hoofs.

In the meantime the girl intercepts her sweetheart, who has heard the report of the two shots, and, thinking it is "lover's signal," has started for the cabin. She tells him of the impending tragedy, he jumps up behind her, and together with the other cowboys, the mad chance to save the old man from a horrible death and the destruction of the House on the Plains begins. The racing is lifelike, thrilling and vivid. They reach the House on the Plains at the eleventh hour, rush in, snatching the burning fuse from the almost ignited dynamite, unbind the old man, who is dazed from exhaustion and fear. Explanations follow, and the old man happily gives his daughter to the brave youth. The other cowboys, in the meantime, have captured the Mexicans and hang them to a nearby tree.

WILD BIRDS OF ASIA.—This is a very charming presentation of bird life in a part of the world where feathered creatures exist in infinite variety.

TURNSTONE CURLEW.—A light brown bird with white markings. Its similarity in color to its surroundings is very striking. Most of the stones in its vicinity are brown, interspersed here and there with white ones, so that the bird matcbes them exactly.

YOUNG KESTRELS.—These are pretty little dabs of fluff, all clinging to a branch of a tree.

LAPWING.—A lively bird with a curious tuft of feathers erect at the back of its head.

ASIATIC SHORT-EARED OWL, and its prey. A sleepy looking creature which takes apparently little interest in the food it has secured.

YOUNG CUCKOO, with its foster-mother. The cuckoo's beak is wide open in expectation of food, and as its foster parent does not seem to have any for it, it attacks the long-suffering bird with considerable vigor.

EAGLE OWL AND ITS YOUNG.—The brilliant yellow eyes of the owl are shown with surprising realism. The markings of the feathers are also shown perfectly. A group of young eagle owls follows. The expressions on their faces in some cases are positively comical.

YOUNG LONG-EARED OWL.—Differences between this and the eagle owl just seen are clearly indicated by Kinemacolor. The eyes are of the same bright golden hue, but there is a greater variety in the markings of the head. The bird's aspect is ridiculously solemn.

CROW FEEDING ON WILD DUCK.—The sheen on the crow's black plumage is strikingly shown, and is another instance of the ability of the Kinemacolor to render blacks more faithfully than monotone photography.

ASIATIC EAGLE OWL devouring a bustard.

YOUNG MAGPIES IN NEST.—This is an exceedingly pretty picture; all the magpies have their beaks wide open, and they are evidently calling lustily for food.

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 5 (Jan. 27).

MAX JOINS THE GIANTS (Jan. 28).—Our versatile friend, Max Linder, is an objectionable suitor because of his small stature. To remedy this defect of nature he tries walking on stilts and his maneuvers are extravagantly funny. Before he has perfected himself in this difficult art he reads of a new machine which will make people stouter or taller, as they prefer. Poor Max presses the wrong key, with a result that is entirely new in motion pictures.

HUBBY'S POLLY (Jan. 29).—Paul Barton and his bride are an ideal couple and he takes great care not to displease her. While out walking one day Barton admires a parrot, but his wife refuses to allow him to purchase it. Later in the day, while his wife is out, Barton sends the cook for the parrot. When she brings it home he loses his nerve, and, hiding the bird behind a screen, he goes out until the storm will have blown over, leaving a note in which he explains that the cook knows all about the object hidden behind the screen and asking forgiveness. While he is out the cook is asked by a neighbor to mind her baby. She agrees, but the task interferes with her work, so she places the baby in a basket behind another screen in the room with the parrot. Mrs. Barton returns home, finds the note, and, of course, looks behind the wrong screen. However, after a near tragedy, hubby explains the situation and Mrs. Barton's doubting heart is satisfied.

SAVED BY HIS HORSE (Jan. 30).—Bill Peters, after a long ride on his favorite mare Peggy, stops at dusk and is soon sound asleep. At the first gleam of daylight, Peggy is awake and wanders off, while Bill sleeps the sleep of the just. An Indian scout gets Peggy to his camp and hobbles her forefeet with a rope. With her teeth Peggy soon unties the rope and away she goes, with the Indians in pursuit. Peggy makes her way back to where Bill is sleeping and wakes him. Bill mounts her and flees. He meets a party of white settlers, with their families, moving across the plains. They decide to fight the Redmen off. Bill writes a note which Peggy takes in her teeth, and is off like the wind. In a short time the Indians are preparing for the final rush upon the whites, but in the meantime Peggy has delivered her message to the sheriff, and with his cowboy posse he arrives in time to rescue the settlers.

THE CHAMELEON (Jan. 31).—A film explaining the characteristics and nature of this well-known member of the lizard family which makes a prey of all insects, capturing them by means of a viscous tongue the length of its body. This is truly the reptile with the all-seeing eyes, for it can turn them in any direction. It is easily tamed and is a great pet in some countries.

On the same reel:

THE MAKING OF HATS.—Here we see the labor necessary and the art required in making some of the better quality straw hats. Everybody wears a hat, and for that reason everybody should be interested in the processes used in their manufacture.

THE GREAT PRAYER OF THE ARABS (Feb. 1).—Amongst the Mohammedans, after the Bairam, or feast which follows the fast of the Rhamadan, extraordinary public manifestations and long prayers are made. In this film the Arabs assemble in vast numbers for the great prayer, and the spectacle is impressive and unforgetable. The ceremony is held in the open and the thousand upon thousands of costumed Arabs, each with their little prayer mat, make an interesting study.

On the same reel:

ALONG THE COLUMBIA RIVER.—Scenes along the Gateway to the Northwest, including the most famous salmon fisheries in the world, and some prize specimens. Coming inland, immense agricultural projects are exposed to view, remarkable enough to hold the most elusive spectator.

RELIANCE

SAVED BY AIRSHIP (Jan. 29).—Charles Belmont, a quiet and industrious young man, works in the office of John Burton, a wealthy broker. A fellow clerk, Henry Holloway, does the same, and, like Charles, is enamored of his employer's pretty daughter, Bess. Henry is flashy in his dress and manner, a clever talker and a fine bluffer. And while their employer likes both young men very well, it is apparent that his daughter favors the suit of Henry. Old Burton invites both boys out to his suburban home on Staten Island. The young men arrive at the handsome residence of their host and enter for the dinner party, on Sunday. Henry is all smiles and tries to increase his popularity with the girl and her father. After dinner, Henry, Bess, her father and Charles, step out of the house to look at the vista of the harbor. They see an aviator who is known to the old man, tuning up his aeroplane ready for a trial flight across the bay. He laughingly invites them in. The old man shakes his head, but the young girl, fond of excitement, gleefully accepts, and steps into the machine in spite of her parent's remonstrances. The machine whizzes away and she is seen taking a roundabout ride, while Henry flatters the old man about his daughter's bravery. Charles has great anxiety for her safety. When they return from the aerial flight, the girl jumps out and laughingly offers the others her seat. Charles stoutly refuses, saying he is afraid of the trip. Henry roasts him sarcastically, while he himself steps into the machine and asks for a ride, showing that he is not afraid. However, while the others are looking away, he slips a bill to the aviator, urging him not to stay up long, but to come right down. The machine takes a little trip through the air and then returns. Henry stumbles out very much relieved to get to the ground, but still keeping up the bluff as he teases Charles. The latter finally becomes furious and embarrassed, seeing that the girl is making fun of him as well. Henry asks Bess to elope with him. She laughs and shakes her head, saying there is no way by which they can do so. Finally she spies a launch and she suggests that they use this. She jumps into the launch, which is moored to the shore. She says they can go straight across the harbor to the city. Henry prepares to start it and unloosens the rope. The girl touches off the engine wrong and the boat whizzes forth without the young man in it. She gives a scream, but loses her presence of mind and is unable to steer the boat. The launch lurches into the direction of the harbor, while Henry stands, wringing his hands, at the wharf. Charles and the girl's father and mother rush down to the shore near the aeroplane. They see the launch going out from shore with the unhappy girl in it. The old man wrings his hands at his wife's sobs. They are all at a loss for a means to rescue her, when suddenly, Charles conceives the idea of utilizing the aeroplane. He rushes to the aviator and asks him if he will help him. The aviator says it will be impossible to do anything with the flying machine, but Charles insists, preparing to dive. He kicks off his shoes, flings off his coat and jumps into the machine with the aviator. He throws on speed and the machine whizzes off over the bay, toward the boat. The watchers on shore scream with fright when the launch explodes and the girl is thrown into the water unconscious. The launch is seen at a close view with the girl struggling as best she can, and the smoke coming from the boat. The aeroplane is close at hand and Charles is preparing to drop from it into the water. At last they are seen lowering down toward the drowning girl and, calculating his position to a nicety, he lowers himself from the framework of the aeroplane and drops into the water. Charles rescues the girl and keeps her afloat until she is taken ashore by some boatmen, who have come forth to render assistance. On shore the gallant Henry is sobbing like a baby. The girl is brought in safe and sound and is clasped in her father's and mother's arms. The father kisses the girl, and the young clerk is certain of the father's favor as well as the girl's.

A WIFE'S BATTLE (Feb. 2).—Walter, a clerk, goes blind and is unable to work. He has a young wife and a child of four years. Jane, the wife, finds work as a model and supports her little family. Stanton, the head of the concern employing Jane, becomes infatuated with her and plies her with many attentions which she refuses to accept. She learns that her husband can be cured by an operation which will cost $1,000. This is a ray of hope—but they grow heartsick again, realizing that they can never get that amount together.

Next day at the office Stanton notes Jane's sad face, asks that he be permitted to make her happy, and asks what she wants. With set face, she answers "one thousand dollars." He smiles quizzically at her and writes her a check. Next the operation is performed and it is a success. Stanton calls for Jane and sees her tending her husband, with her little girl clinging to her skirt. He understands and turns away bitterly, his thousand lost to him. But the old doctor, who understands then where the check came from, takes it from his pocket and destroys it, clearing Jane from the weight of her debt. Jane breaks down, but with a great effort she pulls herself together and faces her husband, who knows nothing of what has transpired and must never know.

PUNCH

A WOULD-BE ROMEO (Jan. 30).—Dick Finney, leading man of the Echo Musical Comedy Company, is engaged to pretty Virginia West, of the same company. But he becomes so elated at the mash notes and violets he receives that he neglects Virginia to such an extent that the whole company notices it. The comedian and the leading lady evolve a plan whereby they can bring Master Dick down a notch or two. They write him a letter signing a fictitious girl's name to it. Dick receives the letter during the performance next evening and reads:

"Dear Mr. Finney: Having fallen in love with your performance, I want to meet you. My car will wait for you after the show."

He decides the adventure will be worth while, and, after the performance, he jumps into the car and is whirled off into the country. The car stops and Dick gets out. Up on the lonely road he sees a girl waiting. She is heavily veiled. He hastens toward her. He begs her to remove the veil. She is a trifle reluctant, but finally consents. When she does so he sees the colored waitress of the boarding house before him. He is dumbfounded—then suddenly he sees the actors hiding behind a tree and enjoying the joke.

As he looks toward them they run to the motor car. Seeing their intention, he dives after them. But he is too late. As he watches the departing car he notices a sign: "New York—20 miles." And he suddenly realizes it is up to him to walk.

MAJESTIC

SAVED FROM SIN (Jan. 26).—John Morton, brooding over the death of his wife and child, decides to commit suicide. So that none of his friends may know of it, he dons the attire of a poor workman and goes down into the slums. A poor little girl, unable to purchase milk for the baby, thinks she will rent one of her squalid rooms. Morton, passing, sees the "Room for Rent" sign, and enters, to find the child's drunken father, who willingly gives him the room and takes a few dollars. A little later the child returns and, finding the stranger, she understands. "You are my boarder," she says. "Give me the rent, please, the baby is hungry." He has given his last cent to the father and he tells her so. Heartbroken she goes into the other room to comfort the starving baby. And Morton, alone with his gun, hears the pitiful sobs of the two children in the next room. He cannot commit suicide and leave them there to starve. Unable to bear it any longer, he goes to them and says that, although he has no money, he can pawn his revolver. At this word the little mother grabs the gun, and, bidding him watch the baby, she goes off to "hock" it. Alone with the child, Morton takes it into his arms, and somehow the little clinging fingers bring memories of the past that for the first time are sweet instead of bitter. The little mother returns, and, as Morton helps her with the baby, a policeman enters to tell them that the children's father has been killed in a drunken brawl. Against Morton's wish the children are taken to the society—no one pays any attention to him in his workman's clothes. But next day, when he arrives at the rooms of the society, dressed faultlessly, it is another story. He adopts the children and brings them to his lonely home, where he finds happiness and contentment in their love for him.

WHEN THE LAST LEAF FELL (Jan. 28).—The young American girl believed she had a future in opera, and for some time labored diligently in the chorus, striving all the time for advancement. Her sweetheart urged her to quit the stage and marry him, but the girl, declaring that her art came first, goes with the company, having been promised a better position.

The management kept its word with her, but on the night she first appeared as a principal, misfortune came. While singing her solo her voice suddenly failed her, and just at the moment when things appeared the brightest she found her stage career was over. Broken-hearted, she returned to the poor quarters she occupied with a girl friend, and longed for death to free her. Day by day she grew weaker, and soon a strange fancy possessed her. From her bed she could see a vine outside her window. It was autumn, and day by day the leaves were falling. The girl was convinced that the vine was a token and that when the last leaf fluttered to the ground her sould would pass away. Too weak to write herself, she dictated a letter to her fiance, telling him of the vine. Her chum, who acted as amanuensis, went weeping down the hall with the letter, and, as she passed the door of the next room a kind-hearted old artist, who lived there, heard her, and his sympathy won her confidence. Without telling anyone of his plan the artist cabled to the man in America, signing the girl's name and urging him to come at once. Then, knowing the influence of mind over matter, he watched the vine daily.

The leaves continued to fall until there was only one left, but that seemed particularly hardy. Wind and snow and sleet had no effect upon it, and when the young man arrived it was still there. By this time the girl was recovering from her morbid fancies and was glad to cling to life. Her fiance looked at the vine and his keen eyes noticed that the last leaf was painted on the wall and the artist confessed that he had drawn it to save the life of a winsome girl.

GREAT NORTHERN

AN AVIATOR'S GENEROSITY (Feb. 1).—This is an exciting and interesting story which carries the spectator skyward as the plot is being evolved. There are real aeroplanes in action and the race for the championship is said to be one of the most realistic ever presented in motion pictures. Vidart, an aviator, and his sister, are the only occupants of the old family estate, but the brother becomes involved in debt and has recourse to a professional money lender. The day for payment arrives and young Vidart finds that he has not sufficient money to meet his note. He has recourse to his guardian, but as his yearly allowance has already been overdrawn, he is refused any further money. In the meantime he has entered into an agreement to compete with Aubert, another celebrated birdman, for a prize of $2,500 and the championship. The aviators are close friends and Aubert is introduced to Elsa, the sister of Vidart. It is a case of love at first sight and they have frequent meetings. Before the great race, however, Vidart discovers that Aubert has another sweetheart and thereupon compels his sister to send a letter renouncing him. Vidart accuses Aubert of bad faith and the two part on bad terms. Before the race the former is granted an extension of time on his note with the understanding that should he win, the money lender is to be reimbursed at once. His sister learns of this and hastens to Aubert with the request that he lose the race for her sake. At first he is inclined to be resentful, but upon seeing that Elsa still wears a locket that he had given her, he consents to be content with second prize.

Then comes the exciting race in midair between the two rival birdmen. The machines are plainly visible and one scene is taken from another aeroplane. Below the spectators are all excitement with field glasses pointed skyward, and in the end Vidart reaches the ground first and is proclaimed the winner. His sister is in company with Aubert in the hangar when her brother enters with the prize money and the medal. She takes the latter from him and pins it on the breast of the man she loves with the explanation of how he had sacrificed the race. A reconciliation follows and Aubert and Elsa become engaged.

ECLAIR

THE AMERICAN NIECE (Feb. 2).—Here is some real fun. A stranger in a strange land does strange things—so the home folk think!—but we understand.

Betty was a typical American hoyden. She liked athletics, and, say, she had that dash and vigor that carries you off your feet—and, of course, she seemed queer to the folk in the little Paris town, where she was visiting her uncle to get a French education.

At home her wealthy father had given her everything she had ever expressed a desire for and her habit of getting what she wanted remained with her.

A typical "stunt" was the invitation of a little girl organ-grinder and her blind grandfather to a fine luncheon, to the consternation of all.

The hundreds of extravagances which she insisted upon took all her uncle's money, and suddenly she realized that her kind relatives had been ruined.

That shock—and it was really a shock to Betty when she realized the situation—changed the little lady completely. She immediately hurries to make up for her foolishness—and, among other things, gets a nice big check from father, which much more than repays her relatives their wasted savings.

It is a happy, clever comedy, acted with snap and go. You'll laugh and enjoy it.

On the same reel:

BATHERS IN CEYLON.—You know they grow tea in Ceylon. But did you know what a beautiful land it is? In the summer season the natives spend most of their time in the water. In a most interesting travelogue on the same reel as "The American Niece" you see the dusky islanders using the waterfalls for shower baths, and other decidedly unusual views.

FOR THE CHILD'S SAKE (Feb. 4).—Two hearts broken—and broken of their own will—only because of a little girl's tears.

When the mother of little Clara died, one year before, they did not tell her the sad truth, of course. Clara was to see her dear mamma again—she had only gone far, far away.

Clara had very poor eyes and the best physicians did not know how to help her.

The father was a celebrated lawyer and just about the time when the most acute pain was about over, he happened to have a suit for a beautiful young actress, who had gotten into difficulties with her manager. He won the suit, and the actress, who was a very pretty girl, made quite an impression on Mr. Mason, so strong an impression that before Miss Leslie came to pay him her first visit, the young lawyer could not help but hide in his bookcase the picture of little Clara's mother.

Mason and Miss Leslie met again and soon were genuinely in love, although neither spoke a word of it to the other. But when little Clara had been operated upon successfully, the crisis came. Bending over the dear little child, their hands met and they promised to be—

But more sorrow was ahead. When Clara was told one day that this lady was to become her new "mamma," she turned to the wall where the picture of her dead mother formerly hung and cried hysterically:

"My mamma. Where is my mamma? I want my mamma."

Mason had to give back to his little girl the hidden picture and he tried in vain to persuade Miss Leslie that "this childish caprice would pass away."

It did not pass. Clara cried and cried as if her heart would break. The great specialist was called and he left a note saying "If the cause of those tears is not stopped at once, total blindness will be the result." Miss Leslie, who had just called, finds this note and at once decides upon her sacrifice. She leaves Mason and he allows her to go. It is terribly hard for them both, but—it must be.

He is now sitting—staring straight ahead—thinking of the dream which died so soon, when little Clara comes in on tiptoe, bringing back the picture of her "true mamma." And she shows it to her father with such intense happiness that he does not know what else to do but take her in his arms and kiss her—again and again, the precious child who is left to him to love—and make happy.

THE LOVE CHASE (Feb. 6).—"Cheer up, old man!"

"Huh! What for? I've had so much 'cheer' in the last few years that—Oh! What's the use!"

To a man standing at one side, it sounded like the conversation of a few friends trying to help out one of the great cruel world's "down and outs," and he turned to his neighbor to inquire what particular business or personal "punch" had put that good-looking but grouchy young chap on the "blue" list.

"Who is this lad, who seems so unwilling to join the boys? Is he having a rough time of it?"

"Who—that fellow? Well, hardly! That is Charlie Forbes, head of one of our best firms in town. His trouble is—he has seen all of what he considers 'life' and consequently—the blase grouch. But, mark my words, he'll get a shock one of these days. I think a real nice girl—one with brains and wit—could make him sit up and take notice."

The crowd of fellows who were gathered about young Forbes, here at the club, had little success in "cheering him up," but the men on the side had true enough outlined the wealthy, handsome young man-of-the-world's fate. Soon a new sensation was to come into his life and when it came he lost all that indifference, which had marked him among the fellows for months. And it was a girl—a very charming girl indeed—who brought about this change.

Love and laughter make life worth while—and for spontaneous, bubbling, gurgling happiness see "The Love Chase."

Beautiful girls and manly men—with a background of the majestic, always wonderful Niagara Falls, present one of the jolliest comedy features the picture screen has seen.

It is two reels—feature length—and it is certainly "feature" quality. The story's situations present humorous twists that cause easy, happy laughter.

Charlie's "I've seen it all" attitude worries his doting mother. Thinking she has hit upon the happy solution, Charlie's mother sends for the daughter of her old school-friend, Mrs. Wilton, because she has always loved this young lady and she thinks the charming Miss W. can bring Charles to a realization of all the joy this life really contains.

But Charles, when told of Miss W.'s coming, tells his mother in a tone of disgust—"What! Me marry! Well, not while I have my senses!" Well, Miss Wilton overhears the remark and being a girl of spirit, that meant trouble for Mr. Charles. When Charlie's pal suggests a little conspiracy, Miss Wilton agrees with real interest.

With the pal's assistance, the charming visitor enters Charles' office as a stenographer and the boss comes down with a grouch. He is scolding on all sides when his eyes meet those of the "green" stenographer and immediately something happens. He feels he is "caught" and gets away to avoid those new, strange, wonderful eyes. At the club, the vision of "that new girl" remains with him, but suddenly it is gone and he double quicks to the telephone and asks for news from the office. He is told that the "new stenographer" has departed for Niagara—then comes the "Love Chase."

At Niagara Falls, with the wondrous grandeur of the tumbling waters as a background, the chase of fun and affection continues. But the beautiful maiden is not to be found.

A charming Indian girl seems to have the same eyes that are haunting Charles and after she has slipped away, he reads on the back of a card she sold him—"You did not recognize me. Meet me at your office in New York."

So the fascinating "Love Chase" continues back to the city and out to the ball game, but Charlie does not quite locate that beautiful "stenog," although all the time she is there laughing at him.

Then the boss receives a 'phone call that the stenographer while coming back to the city in an auto has been held up by a wild tiger. In the meantime, an itinerant showman, with a lamb-like tiger has been engaged to pose the pet animal in front of the auto.

Charlie dashes to the rescue and carries Miss Wilton, who has "fainted," to the house. Meeting his mother, Charlie is informed that Miss Wilton, his mother's friend, and the stenographer in his arms are one and the same. He is angry at first, but how could he help but relent and be happy?

SOLAX

OVERCOATS (Feb. 5).—Smith, a clerk at Greene's office, is rather fond of Anne, the pretty stenographer. He sends her some flowers and candy, with a note asking her to go to dinner and the theatre with him Saturday night.

Anne, thinking to surprise Smith, writes her acceptance, and wraping the note around one of her photos, which Smith has asked for, slips it into his overcoat pocket. That night Greene takes Smith's overcoat by mistake. When Greene gets home, his wife finds the photo and the note; and as Smith's name is not mentioned in the note she naturally thinks her husband deceitful. Mrs. Greene, hoping to make her husband repentant, substitutes her own photo with a note asking him to take her, his own wife, to dinner and the theatre Saturday night.

The next morning, the wrong coats are righted, without either knowing that he had worn the other's coat.

Greene finds his wife's picture with her note (upon which there is no name addressed) in Smith's coat; and, naturally, thinks her faithless. Saturday night Mrs. Greene determines to watch her husband; and Mr. Greene determines to watch his wife.

He gets home, just as she is leaving the house. He follows her. She goes to the office and, finding her husband gone, confides all in Smith. Smith, on the other hand, thinking Anne is deceiving him, suggests they both go to Anne's house, and Greene, who has been waiting outside, follows. There the situation comes to a climax, but is soon explained to satisfaction. And both couples are happy.

THE MONKEY ACCOMPLICE (Feb. 7).—Charles Davenport, a wealthy young broker, pays court to and wins the heart of Geraldine Rand, a very nice girl whose brother Tom is a man of rather shady reputation. The night of the wedding, Geraldine's brother Tom comes back after an absence of several years, and attempts to break into the house of his prospective brother-in-law. Davenport recognizes Tom, and, after a very dramatic scene, exacts from Tom the promise that he will in the future take the straight and narrow path. After his sister is married, Tom tries, and succeeds in making a man out of himself. He secures a position in a broker's office, and is on the high road to prosperity. All would have gone well with him if he had not had his questionable past; for the time comes when cruel suspicion almost wrecks his new and promising career. The cause of it all is an Italian's monkey, trained not only to win pennies for his master, but also to climb up the sides of buildings, enter boudoirs, and make away with ladies' jewels. When a necklace belonging to Tom's sister disappears in a mysterious fashion, naturally Tom is suspected by his brother-in-law, and circumstantial evidence implicates him in such a fashion that he is unable to explain his way out of the difficulty. With the aid, however, of a bootblack whom Tom had befriended, the crime is traced to the proper source, and the monkey and the Italian whose combined criminal and mysterious efforts have baffled detectives and the police for several months, are put out of business.

THANHOUSER

HER NEPHEWS FROM LABRADOR (Jan. 26).—A farmer's wife gets word from her brother in Labrador that his sons are visiting the United States for the first time, and that she should show them every courtesy in her power as they "had never heen out of Labrador." With her husband, the aunt meets the train bearing the boys from the cold country. It is snowing when the train pulls in and the farmer and his wife are warmly clad, but to their dismay their nephews alight from the train in shirt sleeves, with their coats over their arms, and fanning themselves vigorously. Finally, their troubled relatives force them to put on their coats and muffle up warmly. To please the aunt and uncle the boys submit, but just the same they make a mysterious trip out of the house each day and come back all smiles. The aunt decides to ferret out the mystery. She follows them to a neighboring lake where the red ball is up, sees them discard their clothes and don bathing suits and then whirl about on the ice. After this they roll in the snow and then do a dive into icy water. The aunt is well nigh attacked by nervous prostration at sight of this, but the boys do not catch pneumonia or anything else dreadful, as she expected, and all ends well and—cold.

THE DOVE IN THE EAGLE'S NEST (Jan. 28).—Count Eberhard von Aldstein was one of the rohber barons who flourished in Europe during the Middle Ages. He was cruel and lawless, plundered the merchants who passed his castle, and cared for no one, except his little sister, Ermyntrude. She fell sick and the Eagle sent a retainer to the valley below to get a nurse to care for the little one. The man returned with Christine, a young village girl, famed alike for her beauty and virtue. She cared for Ermyntrude tenderly, but in vain, and when she returns to her home in the valley the Eagle was desolate, for he had learned to love the nurse. Her gentle influence had caused him to look with abhorrence on his former ways, and the merchants now passed his castle without fear, for the Eagle "soared no more for prey."

The Eagle sought out the village girl in her home and asked her to be his wife, and because Christine had learned to love the baron, she consented gladly, and returned with him to the castle.

Part Two.—Twin sons blessed the union of Eberhard von Alderstein and Christine, the village maid, and the Eagle spent all his time about the castle in the happy companionship of his wife and sons.

But at last a summons came from the king, commanding the Eagle to follow him to war. The eagle complied, and in a skirmish was captured by a baron enemy, and consigned to the galleys as a slave. The victorious baron forced his way into the Eagle's castle and, falsely telling the Dove that her husband was dead, tried to make her marry him. But the Dove, true to her husband, believed that he would return to her, and patiently awaited his return.

The Eagle's enemy occupied the castle with his troops, and one day an opportunity presented itself which would have rid the Dove of him forever, if she had cared to avail herself of it. One of her retainers came to her and whispered that as the enemy passed over the cubliette (which was the prison of the castle) he would press a secret lever and the baron would plunge to his death in the room helow. The Dove, knowing her pleading could not move her retainer from his purpose, sent her twin sons with the baron, and the Eagle's enemy escaped an awful death, for the retainer could not permit the young nobles to share the fate of their father's enemy. In the end, aided by the retainer, the Eagle made his escape from the galleys, and went to the instant relief of his wife and children.

GAUMONT

DOGS WILL BE DOGS (Feb. 6).—Willie Live has informed a friend at the dog pound that he wants a dog, not yet in frankfurter form. He receives a letter from a friend: "I have the dog you pined for. He has a handmade pedigree and a disposition as loving as a boa-constrictor's. He has a baritone bark, four legs in good running order and parts his hair on the side. He is unmarried, sober and can lick anything from a burglar to your face. Kindly collect him at once as the market for frankfurters, frankly speaking, is hot. A Gay Dog." Willie calls for the animal, which is a largesome brute who has been a dog for a short time. He goes walking with him.

Willie is sensible to the charms of women. He sees a pretty girl pass, and soliloquizes that "Many a kind heart beats beneath a peek-aboo waist. I would go to work for a girl like that!" The girl has a little dog half the size of Willie's dog. The under dog is interested in the upper dog and barks softly to herself that Willie's animal is such a manly dog. She (the dog) wonders if he could support a lady dog. She judges by his tail that he is a wag. She wonders that people think it awful to go to the dogs.

Willie tries to flirt with the girl but she is as affectionate as she would have been to her mother-in-law.

Nero, Willie's dog, decides that he will make the acquaintance of the girl's dog. Nero barks to Willie that he is sure that he has met that dog somewhere—that its tail is very familiar. He continues that he believes they went to different kennels together. He starts after the smaller dog. Willie tries to hold him back. "Unhand me, man. That dog is my affinity. I want to give her my telephone number," barks noble Nero. As Willie becomes entangled in a small truck, used for carrying trunks, etc., he remarks: "Thou too, brutel Some Go-cart!"

Willie sprawls over it and Nero races down the street pulling at his rope. It is down hill and they quickly gain on the girl and her pet. The girl joins her parents in the garden of their home, wherein follows Willie and Nero. Willie, with great courage, declares that he loves the girl with all the fervor of a ribbon clerk's poetic soul. They repulse him, whereupon he pulls from his pocket a formidable appearing young cannon which he puts to his head as if to blow out a few brains he kept there for safekeeping. Rather than have him muss up the garden, the girl's parents decide they would have him for a son-in-law. They were afraid that if he should commit suicide it might spoil their appetite. And, too, he might fall and break the fragile flowers. After Willie has won the girl, however, he shows that he had just about as much intention of committing suicide as he had of opening a Chinese laundry. He opens what was presumably a revolver. It was a cigarette case. He blandly offers a cigarette to his newly elected papa-in-law. Although chagrined that they had been so fooled the parents value the novelty of the ruse and decide that they will allow him to enter the family. They hope to get him a job in the shipping department of a merry-go-round. The two dogs meanwhile have become friendly and have agreed that they could live as cheaply as one. Nero had asked Lizzie, the little dog, whether she could live on his salary and she had replied that she thought she could if he could get another for himself.

IN THE CLAWS OF THE LEOPARD.—John Waring, a prospector, receives discouraging news regarding his lands in the wilds of South Africa. The drought has ruined the harvest. There is no food for the cattle. Fever has broken out among the men. The men are being attacked by wild beasts.

Waring determines to go to the property and examine conditions for himself. He sends a letter by a postrider to that effect. Only too true was the message from the manager of operations—the postrider is devoured by a leopard as he passes through the forest. Waring on arriving at the property examines loose shale and finds traces of minerals. Before he has time to act upon his discovery he falls a victim to the "fever" and dies.

Simpson, the manager, finds on the table in the dead man's room a letter which Waring had been writing. The letter reads in part: "I am certain that there is a gold bearing vein . . . ." The manager and another man agree to keep Waring's discovery to themselves. They plot to obtain possession of the claim. In writing to Waring's widow they depreciate the value of the property and offer her $5,000 for it. Mrs. Waring is suspicious, and thinks that if it is worth $5,000 to them it must be worth more to her. She says that she will have an expert make a thorough survey of the property and that she cannot accept their offer until this has been done.

Accompanied by Jack, her late husband's friend, she goes to the mine. The manager and his accomplices are at a loss to know how to get rid of Mrs. Waring. A letter to the foreman saying that another man had been carried away by a leopard and that the beasts attack the camp every night, suggests a means. To get Jack out of the way is then a problem. They lead him into a card game and induce him to drink. They had written an anonymous letter to Mrs. Waring which read: "The manager has hidden in the house at the mine specimens of ore which he intends to omit from the inventory. If you go alone at night and enter by the little door you will see for yourself. A Well Wisher."

The mine house mentioned is some distance from Mrs. Waring's home, and has been long empty. It is in a wild country and wild beasts swarm around it. A leopard with a healthy appetite smells human food and enters the mine house. It attacks Mrs. Waring, who had gone there. From room to room she fights it off, and although wounded by the claws and teeth of the savage beast prevents it from killing her.

Jack still is engrossed in his card game. Suddenly he realizes that a deeper game is being played. He sees Simpson surreptitiously refill Jack's glass for the tenth time. There is a fight. Suspecting that the mine house might be the scene of an unknown plot, Jack quickly gallops there and enters just in time—Mrs. Waring, her strength exhausted, is at the mercy of the leopard. Jack shoots it. After a day of careful nursing Mrs. Waring is able to go home. The mine manager and his accomplices endeavor to escape but Jack overtakes and deals summarily with them.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION No. 1 OF NEW YORK

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Recording Secretary—George Epstein.
Secretary-Treasurer—Robert Levy.
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—Ralph Knaster.

Telephone—Stuyvesant 572.
Office—133 Third Avenue.

The Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1, held their last regular meeting on Monday, January 20, 1913, at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street. The meeting was called to order at 12:30 a. m. by President Robert Goldblatt, and it was one of those meetings that anyone would be proud of to be present. It was the largest, nearly four hundred members attended. The hall was filled to capacity, Mr. Cooper, of the Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity, was present and was elected an honorary member.

Indeed the men are more than proud of their honorary members, namely, Mr. John Bunny, of the Vitagraph artists; Alfred H. Saunders, editor of the Moving Picture News; Mr. Hochstedter, president of the Hochstedter Utility Co., and Messrs. Quinn and Cooper, of the Electrical Bureau. Brother Cooper addressed the body in a very few words, which carried weight behind them, and were to the point; when he finished applause rang out, the ovation lasting fully ten minutes. These recommendations of the executive board were placed before the body for approval: First, that the business representative, Ralph Knaster, shall receive an increase of salary; second, that the secretary, also secretary-treasurer, shall be exempt from paying dues and all taxation while in office; third, that the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1, shall give a donation of $10 00 to the struggling garment workers. All were approved and many more interesting things for the benefit of the organization were accomplished. The meeting adjourned at 4:15 a. m.

The writer was informed that all issues and Chat columns are kept on file at the office of Local No. 35, and an answer on file for each Chat column. That is a splendid idea, but since the columns of the Moving Picture News are open to the operator for publication, why not send in your answers, as this paper will print anything that is fit to put before the public.

In this issue you will note the pictures of Mr. John Bunny, of the Vitagraph players, and Miss Pearl White, playing leads for the Crystal Film Company, two of the most popular artists of the moving picture industry. They will lead the grand march at the entertainment and ball of the M. P. M. O. U. at Palm Garden on February 10, 1913. There will be present at this affair all of the leading artists of the picture film, and many others of the vaudeville and musical comedy stage. In all this will be one grand affair.

The following talent will appear at the entertainment: The Churchill Trio, Joe Morris' melodists; West and Simmons, Ted Snyder's cabaret songsters; Nelson Duo; Harry Montgomery; Miss Grace Day, vocalist; the Four Bryants' Quartette (some singers). Last but not least, Mr. Ralph Ince, assisted by Mrs. Maurice and Mr. Richard Rosson, in a one-act sketch taken from the Vitagraph's splendid production "The Seventh Son," featuring Mr. Ince in his famous character impersonation of the immortal Abraham Lincoln. Also motion pictures never projected before.

MR. JOHN BUNNY

MISS PEARL WHITE

Don't forget to get tickets at the office of the Union, 133 Third avenue, near Fourteenth street.

Thanks to the brother of Cleveland, Ohio, who sent in his Chat to the M. P. News last week. More of this work will be greatly appreciated. The columns of the News are open to all locals of operators, and news from the various operators throughout the country will be gladly accepted for publication.

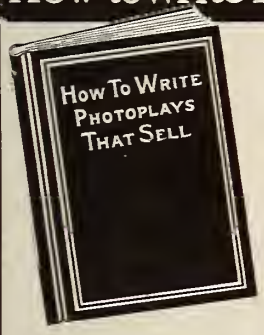
How to Write Photoplays that Sell



HERE IS A NEW BOOK FRESH FROM THE PRESS THAT WILL TELL YOU

—how to write strong, red-blooded scenarios that laugh at rejection slips.

—how to express your photoplay ideas in that crisp, clean-cut, magnetic English that makes your synopsis speak action—that's what the editors want.

—how to become the editor's friend and always know what and when the different sorts of ideas are wanted.

This book tells clearly, concisely, specifically, the things you should do to get your ideas across, tells how you can originate photoplay ideas and build them into saleable scenarios. Costs but ONE DOLLAR a copy.

EXHIBITORS!

Your patrons want this book, and you can sell it to them. You can advertise it on your screen—we furnish colored slide. You make FORTY CENTS profit on each book without turning a hand.

Send $3.00 for five books and one slide as a trial order. If you fail to dispose of them, we will refund your money. That's fair, isn't it?

Something for Something

For 25c we will send to you weekly, for six months, the eight-page newspaper, the GAUMONT GRAPHIC. It is interesting and instructive. It contains stories, synopses, etc. This subscription price will pay the postage.

Should you not know whether it is a good money's work, send for a month's sample copies.

We first thought we would give it free. Then we reconsidered that something worth reading is worth paying for. Find out whether it is. Write now.

A Good Big Clock
For Very Little Money

EVERY EXHIBITOR Should have a GOOD clock next to the screen. Should subscribe for a GOOD trade paper.

The Moving Picture News

Having made a favorable arrangement with one of the largest clock companies in this country, can now offer to its readers a Regular Eight Day Clock, 38½ inches high, with a 12-inch dial, and a subscription to the Moving Picture News for one year for $4.45.

This clock is first-class in every respect and would cost you a great deal more than the price we charge you for both the clock and subscription combined.

The offer is good for old or new subscribers, and is offered for a limited period to show you how you can get two GOOD articles for a small outlay, and you need both.

REMIT BY CHEQUE OR POST OFFICE MONEY ORDER

NOTE:—As three of these clocks can be forwarded by freight at the same cost as one only (the three weighing under 100 lbs.), it will pay you to send in three subscriptions for one delivery to the same freigbt office at $4.45 each and divide the freight cost.

Each clock is packed in a wooden case, f.o.b. at the factory, Forestville, Conn., weight 30 lbs. Have your local agent advise you just what the freight charges will be.

Gentlemen:

Ship via Morgan Steamship Line two (2) of your latest model Simplex Machines to me immediately at this office, 720 Maison-Blanche Bldg.

I expect to open a new moving picture theatre very shortly and this will make six of my houses that have two machines in each.

I must congratulate you on the machine you have and am glad to place another order with you.

I wish to advise that the two machines we have in our Alamo Theatre are now sixteen months old and are just as good as the day we put them in.

Would like to have a reply from you as to when the machines will leave New York.

With best wishes, I beg to remain,

Very truly yours,

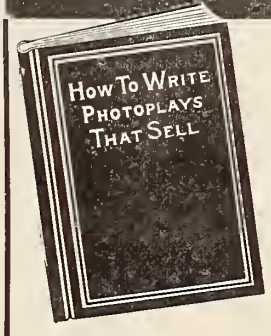
How to Write Photoplays that Sell



HERE IS A NEW BOOK FRESH FROM THE PRESS THAT WILL TELL YOU

—how to write strong, red-blooded scenarios that laugh at rejection slips.

—how to express your photoplay ideas in that crisp, clean-cut, magnetic English that makes your synopsis speak action—that's what the editors want.

—how to become the editor's friend and always know what and when the different sorts of ideas are wanted.

This book tells clearly, concisely, specifically, the things you should do to get your ideas across, tells how you can originate photoplay ideas and build them into saleable scenarios. Costs but ONE DOLLAR a copy.

EXHIBITORS!

Your patrons want this book, and you can sell it to them. You can advertise it on your screen—we furnish colored slide. You make FORTY CENTS profit on each book without turning a hand.

Send $3.00 for five books and one slide as a trial order. If you fail to dispose of them, we will refund your money. That's fair, isn't it?

WHERE IS IT DRIFTING?

THE Cinematograph industry, I mean. It seems so hard to say where the industry stands in America to-day, and, from all accounts, an equal chaos exists abroad. I have three or four letters, one from a firm of the highest standing in London, from which I extract the following:

> "We shall be greatly obliged, if it is in your favor, to endeavor to find some good American manufacturer who is anxious to arrange for an English and Continental agency. At the present time we could do very well with one or two makes of American films. . . . Should anybody be willing to arrange with us for their agency we should not be in a position to guarantee a stipulated amount for each subject, but will do all we possibly can to push the sale of films, which is of course necessary to the mutual benefit of all concerned."

This shows how anxious England and the Continent are to obtain American films of good quality that are not represented in England.

Another letter from Berlin, Germany, has the following clause:

> "Can you recommend any good American educational subjects, something that will attract the higher people and the educational authorities in this city? We do not want indecent films, but something of an educational standard. If you can recommend us to any firms making good subjects we will be glad to correspond with them. Of course, you understand these films must be of the very highest class."

Again, to quote from another letter:

> "I seize this opportunity to inquire whether you know of a reasonable concern in your city which would be in a position to handle the sale of first class European films with exclusive rights for the States."

If some of my readers would tell me how to answer these letters satisfactorily, I would be extremely grateful. There is not a mail steamer coming in to the Port of New York but what bears letters like the above, showing a terrible unrest abroad, and a desire to obtain good American films. If some of the manufacturers who are not already represented abroad will put themselves in communication with me I may be able to give them information to their advantage; and any reliable firm desiring to take the agency of a high class foreign production, if they will write, the information is available. But, and here is a big but, staring one in the face right at the outset, which leads again to the question at the head of this article—Where are we drifting?

The chaotic state in the trade at the present time is utterly appalling, and the pictures in many instances being turned out take me back to four or five years ago, when the manufacturers distinctly said they did not care what they put out, nor how bad it was. The exhibitors were compelled to take them and all they wanted was the money. To quote from another letter:

> "The Motion Picture business to-day is in a chaotic condition. Everybody seems to be wanting something and they have no settled policy as to just what they want.
> The facts are, in my opinion, that we should all move slowly at this time. . . . Two things ought to be accomplished at this time—first, the elimination of the unjust $2.00 a week license, and second, that all exhibitors should have the right to run any film regardless of the make at any time they so desire. Understand, I am not advocating by this principle the open market. I am advocating commercial freedom, and the open market is a question that needs due consideration, and time alone will develop many interesting facts as to the advisability in this country of the open market."

These letters have a tendency to show, like a straw, which way the wind blows, and for my part I would be glad if it would blow in favor of the exhibitor. A good "trade wind" when each and every one could do as he wished, as is expressed in the last quoted letter, "that all exhibitors should have the right to run any film regardless of the make at any time they so desire." Another letter reads:

> "I have been perusing the News to learn from its columns how the Trust is acting before the Commission, and I have not seen anything in your columns yet as to what is being done. It seems to me that much should be accomplished by this Commission, and that the Trust should be dissolved. There is much evidence to be given, and if we can only get the $2.00 done away with and the right to select the film we wish, all would be well."

The eyes of the exhibitors all over the country are upon the inquiry being held at the Hotel McAlpin in New York, where evidence is being taken. So far evidence has been given by H. N. Marvin, of the Biograph, and Wm. H. Swanson, of the Universal Film Co., I understand there are something like between 80 and 90 more witnesses to be brought before the Commission. The daily papers all over the country have been giving full reports of what is taking place, hence I did not think it right to crowd my limited space by giving the voluminous reports of the Commission. A résumé of the evidence will appear in these columns when the Commission reconvenes on Feb. 5th, and I sincerely trust that the results of the inquiry will be of a far-reaching character, such as will enable the exhibitor to obtain the best, and only the best; that will enable him to select the films he most desires to use for his patrons, and further, that the result of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League will be a complete censorship and selection of films that give the best all-round progress.

Alfred H. Saunders.

MOVING PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE CONVENTION AT COLUMBUS, OHIO

Columbus, Ohio, January 23—In the historic Southern Hotel, here, just two years ago there gathered a small number of exhibitors pursuant to the call of M. A. Neff, and where there was born the thriving infant, the Exhibitors' League, that has since grown to powerful manhood, on Tuesday and Wednesday was the scene of the eighth annual convention of the Ohio branch of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America.

The hotel was thrown open to the moving picture men, whose exhibits occupied the greater part of the first two floors. A stage was erected in the main dining-room and a vaudeville and feature film exhibition was held there Tuesday evening The event was very largely attended.

Officers were elected Tuesday evening. They are: M. A. Neff, president; O. B. Weaver, Dayton, first vice-president; Dr. Walter Prentice, Dayton, second vice-president; John H. Broomhall, Hamilton, secretary; W. R. Wilson, Columbus, treasurer; W. A. Pettis, national vice-president. J. A. Maddox and Max Stearn, of Columbus, are among fifteen delegates to the national convention in New York in July.

National vice-presidents and heads of their state organizations who were present were T. A. Brown, Iowa; E. W. Martin, Kansas; F. J. Herrington, Pennsylvania; George H. Wiley, Missouri; J. E. Schlank, Nebraska; S. E. Morris, Ohio; F. J. Rembusch, Indiana; C. Coffman, California; S F. Blumenthal, New Jersey; T. P. Finnegan, Texas; Orene Parke, Kentucky.

At noon Wednesday the delegates marched to the Ohio State House, on the steps of which moving pictures were taken of the exhibitors with Governor James M. Cox, his staff, and other state officials.

Mayor Gus Karb in the course of an address welcoming the 400 delegates to Columbus Tuesday afternoon, said:

"Although there has been considerable agitation about the morality of some moving pictures, I see no reason whatever why Columbus should fear objectionable pictures. I feel certain that not one Columbus operator shows films that he would not be glad to have his wife or his daughters witness."

"I am sure that none of you object to censorship of moving pictures as long as that censorship is made by competent persons," said Mayor Karb. In responding, President M. A. Neff, of Cincinnati, of the state and national organization, said that the League greatly desired state censorship of films and hoped that the present Legislature would pass such a law.

Governor Cox, in his first message to the Ohio Legislature states that legal regulation of moving picture shows is eminently desirable. This was embodied in his message after Mayor Baker, of Cleveland, had stirred up a row by having his policemen act as individual censors of picture shows of the Forest City. Then to placate the friends and patrons of the moving picture he appointed an unknown quantity as city censor. The state law of censorship will likely pass the Ohio Legislature. Although President Neff is quoted as favoring the idea, yet many exhibitors feel that such censorship is unnecessary.

A state censor of moving pictures may become rather a ridiculous functionary. Unless such an official is qualified by a thorough knowledge and by experience, he will be worse than useless Every community should feel itself fully qualified to deal with the moving picture problem without a state official, supported by the exhibitors' pocketbooks dictating. The people are, after all, the best to judge. Playhouses showing immoral or overly sensational pictures will soon feel the loss of patronage, for careful parents soon learn to know the places where careless programs are permitted.

If a state censor for moving pictures, why not a state censor for the regular Ohio theatre. It is a fair argument for to-day in Ohio there are productions shown at popular prices in theatres that no film manufacturer would have the nerve to put on the screen. A state control for a matter so distinctly the affair of the people would seem somewhat inimical to the principle of home rule which has lately become dear to Ohio communities, even though the specific use is one of relative small importance. At any rate, no censor in Columbus should have final authority on a matter which pertains wholly to the people of Ohio, who are as enlightened a people as any and have enough judgment to choose their entertainment without state assistance.

It might be here remarked that the Cleveland "censorship" is proving a farce, just as a state "censorship" is likely to become farcical. Mayor Baker's administration up in Cleveland has forgotten the "moving picture as a means for crime." The leading newspapers and the women of the Forest City are demanding some protection from the "reform" police force. Thugs are robbing houses right and left, and no woman is safe on the street without an escort. But a dozen arrests have been made and the administration is busy explaining. The Cleveland Leader wishes to know why Chief of Police Kohler went on a vacation right at this time. While he has been lecturing in New York on "reforms" the lawlessness in Cleveland continues unabated. And happy to remark, there is no way to blame the moving pictures for this state of affairs.

STATE OF OHIO CENSOR BOARD BILL

Section 1. It is hereby declared unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to exhibit or show any motion picture within the State of Ohio, unless it shall have been passed, approved and stamped by the Ohio State Censor Board or the National Congress of Censors as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 2. There is hereby created a board known as the Ohio State Censor Board, consisting of three members to be appointed by the governor for terms of two, three and four years.

Sec. 3. It shall be the duty of such board to examine and censor all motion picture films to be exhibited and displayed in the State of Ohio, which shall be submitted to them, upon the payment to said board of one dollar for each film to be censored.

Sec. 4. All, and only, such films as are in the judgment and discretion of said board, of a moral, amusing or educational character, and not of an indecent subject, nor representing lust, shall be passed and approved by such board, and shall be stamped or designated in an appropriate manner and consecutively numbered that the same may be projected upon the screen preceding the picture.

Sec. 5. A majority of the members of said board shall constitute a quorum and in regular session may exercise all of the powers and duties of the board.

During the absence or incapacitation of any member of said board, the governor may appoint a member to fill such temporary or permanent vacancy.

Sec. 6. By a majority vote of the State Censor Board hereby created, they may work in conjunction with censor boards of other states as a National Censor Congress and the action of said congress in approving or rejecting films shall be considered as the action of said board and so designated, and have the same force and effect as if approved by the board hereby created in separate session.

Sec. 7. When films have been passed and approved by the Ohio State Censor Board or the National Censor Congress and stamped and numbered by the board hereby created, as provided for herein, they may be shown and exhibited within the State of Ohio without restriction or interference, county or state officers to the contrary notwithstanding.

Sec. 8. Such censor board shall, before the 10th day of each month make a complete report of the amount of money received by them for censoring picture films and shall pay all money so received into the general revenue fund of the Ohio State Treasury.

Sec. 9. Each member of said Board of Examiners shall receive an annual salary of $1,500, except the chairman, who shall receive an annual salary of $2,000. The secretary of such board shall receive an annual salary of $1,200. All salaries hereunder and all expenses necessary to maintain said board and carrying into effect the purposes thereof shall be paid out of the general revenue fund of the State of Ohio, which, however, shall not exceed in any one year the revenue produced in censoring films.

Sec. 10. Any person violating any of the provisions of this Act shall, upon the conviction thereof, be fined not less than $50 nor more than $500, or imprisoned not less than thirty days or more than one year or both for each offense.

WASHINGTON STATE ASSOCIATION OF MOVING PICTURE EXHIBITORS

January 21, 1913.

The exhibitors of the State of Washington have at last awakened to the fact that an exhibitors' league is a vital necessity and have succeeded in organizing a state league.

The first annual convention of the Washington State Association of Moving Picture Exhibitors will be held in Seattle on February 18-19, 1913, at which time we expect at least fifty per cent of the exhibitors in the state to be in attendance.

The following letter was sent out to the different exhibitors, and to date many have sent encouraging responses. Mr. Exhibitor:

This is a call made directly to you. The Washington State Association of Moving Picture Exhibitors has arrived, and it is here to stay. To get material results, we must have your support.

What we have already done is outlined in the constitution and by-laws. What we hope to accomplish, in benefits and mutual protection to exhibitors throughout the state depends entirely upon your active co-operation in this movement.

The first meeting of Exhibitors was held in Seattle, November 8th, at which time just four moving picture exhibitors were in attendance. The result of this meeting was that a temporary secretary was elected and a general call was sent to all exhibitors in Washington to meet again in Seattle, at Arcade Hall, on November 26, 1912.

The meeting at Seattle, Wash., November 26th, was a success, and a substantial organization was perfected, temporary officers were elected, and a date for the first annual state convention of the Washington State Association of Moving Picture Exhibitors was set for February 18-19, 1913, at Arcade Hall, Seattle, Wash.

Help yourself by helping this movement. Fill out enclosed application blank and forward to the secretary, and arrange your business so that you can be with us and give the association the benefit of your counsel and experience.

Do you know that there are cities in this great State of Washington that prohibit the operation of moving picture theatres on Sundays, and that there is now a movement on foot in various communities to make Sunday closing a live issue at the coming session of the State Legislature?

How would that suit you? Organized opposition of a militant nature, state-wide in its character, is our only hope. This is only one of the innumerable problems that we must solve. You know how unfairly rigorous the censorship is becoming; how unbearably high the license in most cities; how arrogant the stand of the film exchanges on certain points, vital to your business, and the utter helplessness of the individual exhibitor in the matter of adverse legislation, generally based on bias or ignorance. For these reasons we want you with us.

Yours for the association,
JOHN RANTZ, Secretary.

So far the burden of work has fallen upon the officers who were installed at the first meeting, which was held in Seattle on November 8th, viz:

President—A. B. Campbell, Sedro Woolley.
Vice-President—J. L. Shanks, Seattle.
Secretary and Treasurer—J. Rantz, Bremerton.

The above officers and Mr. H. O. Allen, of Seattle, form the executive board.

The organization cordially invites anyone affiliated with either the National League or any of the different state leagues to be with us at the convention. To those unable to favor us with their presence, we will be very grateful for any advice or suggestion that they may send.

JOHN RANTZ, Secretary.

Majestic release February 4.

PRESIDENT NEFF A BUSY MAN

Now that the Ohio Convention and National Conference of the National Vice-Presidents have met and held successful meetings, the organization is moving on.

A meeting is called of the exhibitors of the State of Oklahoma to meet in Oklahoma City, at the New Skirvin Hotel, on the 11th and 12th of February, with Carl Gregg as chairman of the committee of arrangements. This will be one of the biggest conventions so far held in the South. President Neff will be there to organize a permanent organization.

After the Oklahoma meeting, President Neff will leave for Little Rock, Ark., where a meeting is called for the State of Arkansas on February 14th, at the Marion Hotel. Mr. S. A. Arnold is chairman o fthe committee on arrangements.

From Little Rock, Ark., President Neff will probably go to Houston, Tex., to meet with the Texas exhibitors, and from Houston he will go to Gulfport, Miss., where a State meeting will be held. Fred Abbley will be the chairman of the committee on arrangements for the convention.

From Gulfport, Miss., President Neff will go to New Orleans to hold a State convention in Louisiana. From New Orleans he will go to Birmingham, Ala., to meet with the exhibitors of Alabama and organize them into a solid, permanent organization. From Birmingham he will go to Nashville, Tenn., where a State meeting will be held under the direction of W. H. Wasserman, of Tennessee. From Tennessee, Mr. Neff will return to his Cincinnati office.

THE RACE FOR THE MILLIONS

(Three-reel Gaumont)

The story of the little milliner in "The Race for Millions," and which the Gaumont director has told in three reels of films, is of peculiar interest, notwithstanding the fact that a great deal of melodrama has been introduced to pad out the story.

Nellie's uncle has left her $2,000,000. It is, however, stipulated in the will that, should the young woman not be found within two months from twelve o'clock, noon, from the day set, that the estate is to revert to his housekeeper.

The housekeeper, an unscrupulous woman determines to get the money, enlisting in her behalf her brother.

The young woman is kidnapped and carried off to a mysterious island off the coast, from which she afterwards escapes. Her fiance learns her whereabouts and they plan a balloon flight when pursued by the conspirators. The brother of the housekeeper fires a revolver at the gas bag as the balloon is on the ascent, and the occupants are thrown into the waves. They, however, make good their escape from their pursuers, whom they outwit, gaining possession of the fortune, and causing the arrest and punishment of the conspirators.

THE BLACKSMITH'S STORY

By Frank Olive

Well, no! My wife ain't dead, sir; but I've lost her all the same;
She left me voluntarily, and neither was to blame.
It's rather a queer story, and I think you will agree—
When you hear the circumstances—'twas rather rough on me.

She was a soldier's widow; he was killed at Malvern Hill;
And when I married her she seemed to sorrow for him still;
But I brought her here to Kansas, and I never want to see
A better wife than Mary was for five bright years to me.

The change of scene brought cheerfulness, and soon a rosy glow
Of happiness warmed Mary's cheeks and melted all their snow.
I think she loved me some—I'm bound to think that of her, sir—
And as for me, I can't begin to tell how I loved her!

Three years ago the baby came, our humble home to bless;
And then I reckon I was nigh to perfect happiness;
'Twas hers—'twas mine—but I've no language to explain to you,
How that little girl's weak fingers our hearts together drew.

Once we watched it through a fever, and with each gasping breath,
Dumb with an awful, wordless woe, we waited for its death;
And, though I'm not a pious man, our souls together there,
For Heaven to spare our darling, went up in voiceless prayer.

And when the doctor said'twould live, our joy what words could tell?
Clasped in each other's arms, our grateful tears together fell.
Sometimes, you see, the shadow fell across our little nest,
But it only made the sunshine seem a double welcome guest.

Work came to me a-plenty, and I kept the anvil ringing;
Early and late you'd find me there a-hammering and singing;
Love nerved my arm to labor, and moved my tongue to song,
And though my singing wasn't sweet, it was tremendous strong!

One day a one-armed stranger stopped to have me nail a shoe,
And while I was at work, we passed a compliment or two;
I asked him how he lost his arm. He said 'twas shot away
At Malvern Hill. "At Malvern Hill? Did you know Robert May?"

"That's me," said he. "You, you!" I gasped, choking with horrid doubt;
"If you're the man, just follow me; we'll try this mystery out."
With dizzy steps, I led him in to Mary. God! 'Twas true.
Then the bitterest pangs of misery, unspeakable, I knew.

Frozen with deadly horror, she stared with eyes of stone.
And from her quivering lips there broke one wild, despairing moan.
'Twas he! the husband of her youth, now risen from the dead,
But all too late—with bitter cry, her senses sudden fled.

What could be done? He was reported dead. On his return
He strove in vain some tiding of his absent wife to learn.
'Twas well that he was innocent! Else I'd 've killed him, too,
So dead he never would have riz till Gabriel's trumpet blew!

It was agreed that Mary then between us should decide,
And each by her decision would sacredly abide.
No sinner, at the judgment-seat, waiting eternal doom,
Could suffer what I did, while waiting sentence in that room.

Rigid and breathless, there we stood, with nerves as tense as steel,
While Mary's eyes sought each white face, in piteous appeal.
God! could not woman's duty be less hardly reconciled
Between her lawful husband and the father of her child?

Ah, how my heart was chilled to ice, when she knelt down and said:
"Forgive me, John! He is my husband! Here, alive—not dead!"
I raised her tenderly, and tried to tell her she was right,
But somehow, in my aching breast, the prisoned words stuck tight!

"But, John, I can't leave baby——" "What! wife and child!" cried I;
"Must I yield all! Ah, cruel fate! Better that I should die.
Think of the long, sad, lonely hours, waiting in gloom, for me,—
No wife to cheer me with her love, no babe to climb my knee!

"And yet—you are her mother, and the sacred mother love
Is still the purest, tenderest tie that Heaven ever wove.
Take her, but promise, Mary,—for that will bring no shame,—
My little girl shall bear, and learn to lisp her father's name!"

It may be, in the life to come, I'll meet my child and wife;
But yonder, by my cottage gate, we parted for this life;
One long hand-clasp from Mary, and my dream of love was done!
One long embrace from baby, and my happiness was gone!

CANADA AND CINEMATOGRAPHY

In a letter received from Sask, Canada, the following interesting information occurs:

> "That the Canadian Government has made a new law, raising the license from $20 to $300 per year, and are limiting the license to one show for each 5,000 people. Therefore, in a town of 20,000 people, only four shows would be allowed."
> Further, that "in Saskatoon there were twelve shows with a population of 30,000—six of these had to close their doors."

THE DAUGHTER OF HEAVEN

To the Editor of Moving Picture News:

Dear Sir:—I would like to reply to your criticism of the Wurlitzer-Hope-Jones Unit Orchestra, under the above caption in your January 11th number.

The great Dr. Johnson, of dictionary fame, once said that the man who did not believe in ghosts flew in the face of the testimony of all ages and all nations. In like manner, he who calls a Hope-Jones organ a "magnified hurdy-gurdy" flies in the face of the testimony of English-speaking musicians in all parts of the world.

Here is a hitherto unpublished letter from the learned Dr. G. Bedart, of the University of Lille, France, which I happen to have by me. Speaking of the Hope-Jones Unit organ (call it orchestra if you wish) in Ocean Grove, he says:

"It is stupendous! . . . it is a new thing, an immense orchestrion with new sonorities. From time to time the organ tone reappears; from time to time you would imagine a brass band and a symphony orchestra playing with an organ. It is a new thing, participating of the organ, of the brass band, and of the orchestra."

Dr. Bedart is professor of medical electricity and X-rays at Lille University, and the foremost authority on organ-building in France at the present day. If space permitted I could quote you equally favorable opinions from England, Africa, Australia and New Zealand, and all over America. The Edison Monthly for December (the house-organ of the Edison (Light & Power) Co. of New York) contained an article on this organ, founded upon my original description published in The Musical Age for July 11, 1908. This was taken up by the Literary Digest and was commented upon editorially by the New York Times of Sunday last. The musical critic of the Times (Mr. W. J. Henderson) is well known as one of the most capable of New York musicians.

And against all these people ariseth the Moving Picture News and calleth a Hope-Jones organ a "magnified hurdy-gurdy," yea worse, it compareth it to the hurdy-gurdies of our boyhood days, which were crude beyond description!

It was my good fortune to see "The Daughter of Heaven" at the Century Theatre, and although the program stated that only such part of the organ was used as suited the Chinese music, it would have required an orchestra of twenty-eight men to have produced what I heard with my own ears, grouping the instruments as in an orchestral score, viz.: 2 flutes, 2 oboes, 2 cor Anglais, 2 clarinets, 2 bassoons, 1 contra fagotto, 2 cornets, 4 horns, 3 trombones, 1 bass tuba, 2 violins, 1 viola, 1 violoncello, 1 double bass; kettle drum, side drum, tambourine, bells, cymbals, bird call, possible to be played by one man, although good orchestras allow two, and the conductor; I nearly forgot the conductor, whose (mostly unnecessary) antics bring such joy to the heart of the editor of the Moving Picture News.

Be it remembered that when you want more volume of tone than can be produced by 28 men you must increase the force of fiddlers; for instance, the Philharmonic orchestra consists of 28 violins, 8 violas, 8 'cellos and 8 double basses, in addition to the wind instruments noted above.

Alas! the charm of the conductor's baton and the rhythmic motions of the fiddlers are disappearing from our orchestras. Many theatres now bury them out of sight beneath the stage.

For my part, when I behold an orchestra I like to watch the drummer. From the variety of traps he handles it will be seen that he is the most important man there. When our friend, Gertrude Hoffman, goes on tour she takes with her the conductor (who happens to be her husband), the first violin and the drummer. As before remarked, it takes two men to handle the percussion instruments in first-class orchestras, and here is where I think the argument for the Unit orchestra is weak. No man living can manage three keyboards, control 61 stop-keys, 10 percussion studs and 3 expression levers or swell pedals, to equal the individual efforts of 28 men, although some make a very fair attempt.

And some do not. There have been grievous failures, especially where the Musical Protective Union insist on their members being employed. I read in the papers a short time ago of an organ in a New York theatre (not a Hope-Jones, although that would make no difference as far as this story is concerned) that the organist, a good Union man, could not get it to play and the builder was sent for. He found that the wind had not been turned on! Another, in a hotel, only knew enough to turn on the full power of the instrument and played rag-time fortissimo until the patrons of the hotel angrily protested, and the organ was silenced. To again quote Dr. Bedart's letter: "The organists ought to write special music for these new instruments, as Rossini said on hearing the large St. Denis organ." And we need specially trained players to play them.

It seems to me that the so-called Unit orchestra will fill a very special want in moving picture exhibitions in large theatres. Take a theatre like Keith's, where there is an orchestra right along. On Sundays the show is largely moving pictures. The orchestra as a rule plays a waltz or two-step; it is impossible to follow the pictures. Sometimes they slow up for a pathetic scene; the result is at all times unsatisfactory.

The alternative is worse; the pianoforte only, or piano and drum. As a rule the same piece of ragtime does duty all evening; I remember a pianist and drummer at Rockaway Beach who filled the whole time with "Sir Henry's Barn Dance," even playing it during the intermission. What can you expect for $14 a week, and seven days at that? The music spoils the whole show. No wonder the exhibitor changes his pianist every few weeks.

What an opening for the use of the Unit orchestra, played by a musician trained on the lines laid down by your Mr. Ernst Luz! And let me add that no musician is likely to undertake the work unless the exhibitors are prepared to pay decent salaries and cut down the hours of work.

One more quotation from the Literary Digest and I have done. "We read that nine theatres are installing the instrument described. . . . There was considerable criticism of its performance at the opening of the Century Theatre [no doubt from Union men who lost their jobs], but the faults have evidently been remedied or the other theatres would not be adopting it."

The nine theatres mentioned above probably refer to New York only, as I understand that the manufacturers of the Hope-Jones Unit orchestra have orders on hand for upwards of 180 instruments from all parts of the United States and Canada. The proprietors of the Century Theatre have installed another in the Children's Theatre on the roof.

You are, of course, entitled to your individual opinion, but I maintain that the Hope-Jones Unit orchestra is no "magnified hurdy-gurdy." Yours, etc.,

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Editorial Suggestions

MRS. HARTMANN BREUIL, editress Vitagraph Company of America, is a woman of genius. She is one of those unusual women who possess unlimited capacity for hard work, has won every step to her present responsible position by her own talents, and she has placed the editorial department of the Vitagraph company on an enviable plane. Some of the other companies could well study Mrs. Breuil's methods. Her originality and versatility, however, can never be copied. In the course of several years' work as editor of this department, we have received no complaints from picture playwrights of treatment received from Vitagraph. This is an unusual record and the compliment is due the accomplished head of the Vitagraph editorial forces. Here is a communication from Mrs. Breuil which is of interest:

"If you can find room in your column, I would like to make a statement regarding the manner in which manuscripts are sent to us, first giving the reason why an article of this sort would help in the editorial department.

"The editor is supervisor of the work of from ten to twelve people: the reference department, the sub-title making and painting, and, at rare times, the cutting, trimming and changing the film because of the requirements of the Board of Censorship, sometimes being necessary to completely change the story for this reason; the sorting of the mail, the reading, filing, listing and answering of about sixteen hundred manuscripts a month. In the department are the necessary typewriters, stenographers, an assistant editor, the scenario writers, and two readers. Despite this number, every minute of the day is filled for everyone. A record is kept of each manuscript received by us from the day it arrives until it is returned or becomes a full-fledged release. When the manuscript arrives by express, with a request to return in the same way if not available, or with a written request, "do not fold," or accompanied by a long letter giving the life-history of the author's works and life; or a manuscript printed on long sheets of paper (regulation size 8½ x 11) or small sheets, it detains our work in a way that no one perhaps can understand who has not the handling of a maddening number of manuscripts. We are a busy people, and every stamped, self-addressed envelope enclosed in letters posted us necessitates just so much less work on our part. We treat everyone courteously and use as much consideration as possible to anyone submitting their stories to us (this for the benefit of those who try to be "just a little different" from others). Please inform your readers that the best way to send a manuscript, both for the author and for the company to whom it is sent, is to Address all manuscripts directly to manuscript department.

Each manuscript submitted must be accompanied by synopsis of the plot on the first page.

The name and address of the author must also appear on the manuscript.

To insure the return of manuscripts, enclose stamped self-addressed envelope. Do not enclose loose stamps

No manuscripts considered unless typewritten."

Dear Mrs. Breuil, we have been urging readers of this department to conform to the above rules for many, many months. Evidently, some believe our words were entertaining fiction from the tenor of your statement. Writers who heed the kindly advice of Mrs. Breuil will have a better opportunity of marketing than the others. And when you are told to put your plot synopsis on the first page, it does not mean to start a long-winded résumé of your written action on the first page and carry it over. For heaven's sake, if you are going to take goods to market, arrange them temptingly and make 'em salable!

Bon Voyage!

By the time this is published, Giles R Warren, picture playwright, and successful director of Victor film productions, will be on the bounding billows en route to Bermuda, Jamaica, Porto Rico, Panama, etc. He is taking a deserved vacation. When he returns, chock full of new ideas, he will make the Victor pictures brighter than ever, if that were possible.

Questions Worth Answering

Do not write plots bearing on religion. Secular pictures are handled gingerly and generally cause a lot of trouble. A cablegram from Rome says that all Cinematographic representations have been barred from Catholic churches by a decree just issued from the Vatican, which has heretofore approved of moving pictures for purposes of education.

We acknowledge letter from "New York." Just for fun, "New York" wrote a certain "editor" calling attention to our fight against script "colleges" and asking his advice. This "editor" wrote "that we were prejudiced because we have books to sell." He wrote that "most of the schools were all right." The "editorial" letter was enclosed by "New York." We have no books to sell. The schools are "all wrong." We have enclosed this "editorial" letter to his employer with a request that the school defender present his side of the question for publication. (We have later received a letter from the manufacturer in question stating that the "editor" is no longer connected with the company.)

"Atlanta, Ga.," is in a quandary. He writes that some call 'em "scenarios," others "scripts," others "playscripts," and again, "picture plays" is a frequent appellation. We notice, "Atlanta," that nine out of ten editors continue to use the term "scenario." There was a fierce argument about a year ago as to "photoplay," "scenario," etc. It was just another much ado about nothing. Call 'em what you please!

Universal Staff Reorganized

The Universal Central Script Clearing House has been finally reorganized. The contract writer experiment at $35 weekly having failed, and T. Beddings out in a wordy letter universally attacking everybody and everything, a new deal was made. Richard Goodall, an experienced editor and author, has been placed in charge of the central bureau, Mecca Building, and C. B. Hoadley and other experienced men are assisting him. Now that they have people around there that know something, picture playwrights may feel safe in submitting work. With Goodall and Hoadley active, writers will be given attention and courtesy. W. H. Swanson, secretary of the Universal, writes that the script department now consists of over twelve thoroughly experienced and competent writers and that no script is ever permitted to remain in the office for more than 48 hours without action being taken on it.

A Line from Mr. Gumm

Mr. Charles R. Gumm, of Benson, Ariz., insists that we use his name in connection with a letter we received from him this week. We candidly admit that we never heard of Mr. Gumm before. We want to hear from him again, though, and here and now predict that he will be heard from in the picture play game ere long. To one who opens and reads as many letters as we do in the course of a week, there are certain earmarks impressive or unimpressive as the case may be. Mr. Gumm's epistle is impressive. The make-up, stationery, style and typewriting are convincing. Although experience is a dear teacher, yet Mr. Gumm has profited thereby, which is well. He has the right spirit for success. But let us to Mr. Gumm's letter which, we confess, tickles us:

"Stung again!

"However, one more sting added to what I already have will not hurt, but may prevent some one else from getting the same bite.

"I always read Mr. Wright's 'Plots and Plays' Department in the News, to which I am a subscriber, and as you will understand from the first expression, I did not follow his teachings or I would not have been 'stung.' I refer to one of the many 'colleges' and 'institutes' that profess to teach picture play writing. I have for the past four months been trying to 'break in' on the game of picture play writing, but as yet I have not had a script accepted. I was attracted by the glowing advertisements of one of these 'schools,' the 'director' of which claimed to be able to teach 'the professional technique' of the 'picture form' that will get your scripts accepted every time. The price of this 'course' was $10. I, being almost sick from having my scripts returned, grabbed at this bait like a hungry fish (which I was—a sucker). I sent the $10, which I could not afford to throw away, and have received the first 'lesson,' which was written on a typewriter, and I got about the tenth carbon copy. It was all I could do to read this mess of stuff of eight pages, and as for the knowledge it imparts, it is absolutely nothing—simply a list of technical terms with definitions. Many of the words were misspelled.

"With this 'lesson' I received a very poorly typed letter stating that the other 'lessons' would follow in a few days. No one could know how disappointed I was, and I take the liberty of addressing you with the hope that you will use it in your fight against these so-called 'colleges' and 'institutes.' I am a stenographer, employed by a lumber company at a living wage. I have been studying picture play writing for the past four months, and dare say that I know more about it than the 'director' of this 'college' will ever learn. I have studied short-story writing for nearly four years, and if I live I will make a success of it and picture play writing.

"The name of the 'college' to which I refer is ——, Chicago, Ill. The 'director's' name is ——. The advertisement was in the January number of the —— Magazine. I am writing this hoping that you will use all or part of it in the fight against this class of 'educators,' and that it may keep some other poor struggler from getting 'stung' like I have been."

Not a Laughing Matter

Here is a young man, working at a living wage as a stenographer for a Western lumber company. Discouraged because his scripts were rejected, he turns to misleading advertisements and hands over one week's wages for a "course" of "lessons" written at some odd time by a piker who couldn't write a salable script if his life depended upon it. Really, it is not a laughing matter. It is to the easily discouraged that these glowing advertisements appeal and money earned by the hardest kind of labor goes out to keep these grafters well fed. We urge Mr. Gumm and others having similar experiences to keep at it. Do not become discouraged. The best of them have their scripts returned. Work hard, be individual and strictly original, and success may come sooner than you anticipate.

They Will Pay for Them

The Keystone Company, by K. R. Coolidge, states that they will pay liberally for good comedy scripts. Snappy, original stuff, carrying synopsis only is desired.

The Gene Gauntier Feature Players Company is in the market for three-reel subjects. Send scripts to Jacksonville, Fla. Scripts submitted to this concern must be high-class in every detail.

Credit for the Writer

Lubin has joined Edison in crediting the work of deserving authors. We long ago started a crusade for the names of authors on all scripts, and the time will soon be here when our repeated suggestions will bear universal fruit. Credit is due Lubin and Edison and the picture playwrights will appreciate the initiative taken by these companies. Deserving writers should be credited on film, poster and in advertisements.

An Untimely Caution

Do not send out your summery action now. Wait until spring. Along in April is the time to start the open air script upon its rounds.

How to Save Money

Instead of buying writing material at the stationers, go to the job printers and buy Swan linen, cut 8½ x 12. It is good, tough white paper, takes a clear carbon, and the job printer will give you twice as much for your money as you can get elsewhere.

How Directors Work

Some directors are asking for synopsis of plots only. This bears out the importance of our recent statements anent the importance of a carefully prepared, tersely comprehensive synopsis. Have your synopsis clear and logical and write it after you have prepared your scenic layout. Have the synopsis right on the first page. The synopsis may sell the script and the action by scenes may help. Prepare both with care and thought.

FIGHT FILMS BURNED

At the Appraiser's Stores, there were consigned to the furnace about ninety thousand pictures of the negro pugilist in the act of pounding Jim Jeffries in the ring at Reno.

The pictures, which have been shown in every city and village of Brazil, the Argentine, Uruguay and Chili, were brought to this port on January 4th on the Lamport & Holt liner Verdi. The picture films, which were in five reels, measuring 7,500 feet in all, have been a white elephant on the hands of Appraiser Higgins for three weeks, and he decided to get rid of them

The films, which were made of American material and which were exposed and developed in this country, were shipped to South America soon after the Jeffries-Johnson fight on July 4, 1910. The contract provided for their return, but when they arrived here the customs officials decided that they could not enter the country. The owners were informed that by act of Congress, effective July 31, 1912, the importation of moving picture films depicting prize fights or boxing contests is prohibited.

The customs officials ordered that the films be sent back to Buenos Ayres, but the owners suggested that they be burned.

KINEMACOLOR PICTURES OF PANAMA CANAL

Reviewed by M. I. MacDonald

Although the illustrations given below serve to give some insight into the making of the Panama Canal, it is impossible to get a thoroughly accurate idea of the immensity of the work from still pictures. The wonderful Kinemacolor method of photography, however, and the capacity of the company's camera man to always get on the inside track of the best that's going, has given us the most realistic idea possible of how the great waterway severing two continents, is being forced to completion through the engineering skill of Col. Goethals and his human beehive of helpers. At the Carnegie Lyceum each afternoon and evening an enthusiastic audience applauds the efforts of Kinemacolor to throw realism into the reproductions of scenes from the seat of the canal activities.

The program of moving pictures, which is appropriately accompanied by music from the Empire Woman's Orchestra, has its opening in pictures from another portion of the earth upon which the attention of the entire world has been focused for some time past. These pictures depict actual scenes of the Balkan war, and are not only very interesting, but are in a sense an eye-opener to some of us who are unacquainted with the primitive methods of life and warfare in that portion of the world.

The canal pictures open with "Sunrise on the Atlantic," a most beautiful scenic. This, however, does not exceed in beauty a previous picture presented among the war pictures, entitled "Dawn of the Day of Battle of Ostrova." Then comes the arrival at Colon, where the canal employees are shown enjoying themselves at bathing. The scenes at Christobal, especially that showing the residence of Ferdinand de Lesseps, the builder of the Suez Canal, and on whose foundation work the construction of the Panama Canal is being completed.

Then there comes a view of the entrance to the canal, showing the Scotch suction dredge, marine drills and French ladder dredges at work. In the Mindi Cut the drilling to remove the dyke, and the explosion of 12 tons of Trojan powder are interesting. The dipper dredge, 100-hp., at work lifting three tons of rock from a depth in some places of 40 feet of water, at each dip, the cutter and suction dredges at work, the handling and mixing of cement, the cableways, the view of the great sand pile, are all wonderful exemplifications of the system of the construction work of the canal.

The Gatun lock, which will lift vessels 85 feet above sea level, and the lock chamber, 1,000 feet by 110 feet, give some idea of the tremendous dimensions of the channel through which the great ocean steamers will pass on their way to and fro from one ocean to the other.

One of the scenes which causes much enthusiasm is the swinging open of the first of the 600-ton gates in the canal. But that which to the writer is the most remarkable of the entire series is the building of the concrete walls on steel reinforcement. The scheming of the wily brain of man in order to build with his puny hands this tremendous structure which is to cope with the elements through the coming centuries, is quite as awe-inspiring as the pyramids of Egypt, and perhaps more so.

Following the above come views of the Gold Hill district, the Miraflores district, the Empire district, the blowing up of the hill at San Pablo, hydraulic excavation, the City of Panama, and at the close, "Sunset on the Pacific."

The Kinemacolor display of Panama Canal pictures is a marvelous tribute to the art of photography.

EDWARD M. ROSKAM RESIGNS AS MANAGER OF WORLD'S BEST FILM COMPANY

Owing to the enormous growth of the Commercial Motion Pictures Co., Inc., Edward M. Roskam, president of the company, has been forced to sever his connections with the World's Best Film Company in order to handle the enormous amount of orders received daily from various feature manufacturers, exchange men and camera men for developing and printing to be handled at their new factory at 102 West 101st street.

Mr. Roskam wishes to announce the fact that the Commercial Motion Pictures Co., Inc.. is in no way connected with Mr. Carl Laemmle or the Universal Film Mfg. Co.

This enterprising concern's aim is quality. The marksmen behind the laboratory guns are famous for their accuracy.

NICHOLAS POWER COMPANY 1913 CATALOGUE

A copy of the Nicholas Power Company's new catalogue for 1913 has been sent to us, and in the 56 pages there is a vast fund of information relating to the well-known Power's Cameragraph and all accessories, including projection lenses and tables of distances, which alone are worth preserving by every operator, both stationary and traveling. The catalogue is well gotten up, well illustrated, and well printed. We understand a sufficient number have been printed to supply every exhibitor, operator and prospective exhibitor with a copy, which can be obtained on application to Nicholas Power Company, 90 Gold street, New York City.

INTERESTING JAP FILMS FROM ECLAIR

The Eclair Film Company have just received their first shipment of films from their new film plant at Tokio, Japan. One of these, "The Spider," is an interesting study in Japanese drama. This film is exquisitely colored, making a most attractive display of Japanese costumes and landscape.

Another interesting film from this studio is "The Catholic Mission in China."

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—Fred G. Nixon-Nirdlinger will erect a theatre building o nGermantown avenue. Cost $275,000.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—A permit was let to remodel the old market house, at Twenty-sixth and Girard avenue, into a theatre building.

PHILADELPHIA, PA.—A contract has been let for the erection of a new moving picture theatre on corner Twenty-sixth and Girard avenue. Cost $70,000. Also 903 to 907 Sixth street is to be converted into a theatre.

THE LOVE CHASE
(Two-reel Eclair for February 6)

The above is specially worthy of mention. It has an original touch to it and has a pleasant touch of comedy. The young man of millions, tired of the pleasures of life that have come so easily to his hand, becomes very discontented, scorning every proposition for pleasure that is placed before him. His mother, seeing the situation, decides to entertain the daughter of an old friend, a very pretty and charming young lady, in hopes that she may win her son's affections and bring a more joyful tint into his life. He scorns the idea when made acquainted with her wishes.

TWO SCENES FROM "THE LOVE CHASE"
Eclair Release February 6.

The young lady arrives and disguises herself as a new stenographer in his office. He promptly falls in love with her, and then follows a love chase into which are incorporated some very beautiful views of the Falls of Niagara, which alone should insure the success of the picture.

Laugh—and the world laughs with you,
Weep—and it gives you the grin;
Smile! dern you, smile!
You'll get through in style,
And now is the time to begin!

WE want to smile in Reeldom. Yes, smile—not servilely and apologetically; not inanely and vapidly; but an honest, open, happy and proud smile. A real, reel smile.

We want smiles in the pictures and out of them.

Who wouldn't rather see the fanciful, jolly nursery rhyme depicted upon the screen than the criminal intent of some low-browed denizen of the underworld? Who wouldn't rather see the convincing comedy of everyday life, than puzzle and frown over the gloomy, repellent problem play? Who wouldn't rather enjoy the pictured scenes of green fields and running brooks and the flowers, and the blooming fruit trees, than the hovel of the criminal, the home of the harlot, or the attic of poverty? Who wouldn't rather meet the actors and actresses who laugh than Filmland's politician with his grouch?

Wouldn't you?

So would the other fellow.

Don't detail all the aches and pains of this Old World on the moving picture screen. Leave a little place for the sunshine to come in. This world's the best you ever saw, if you only think so. It's just as good as we make it—no better and no worse. Let Filmland see more of the bright and cheerful side and less of the clouds and the rain.

Let's all be friends. Friends—d'you understand?

Let's forget petty animosities, and the furies of jealousy, hate and rivalry. Say! Let's let the rising sun of 1913 warm every nook and corner of Filmland and nurture and cause to grow all the pretty things and all the beneficial things in Filmland's sun-kissed garden.

Laugh—and the world laughs with you,
Weep, and you weep alone.
And in Filmland, fair,
Let us gather where
No troubles or sorrows moan.

The Theatrical Powers asked for bread and were given a stone. The stone is Wizard Edison's talking pictures.

The Theatrical Powers are alarmed.

Who wouldn't be?

Edison declares that he will soon produce whole plays and operas. "Actors will have to leave the legitimate stage to get any money," he is quoted as asserting, "and work in picture studios. We want democracy in our amusements. What opportunity has the ordinary workingman to see a good play produced by good actors, or hear a fine opera in which stars appear at a price that he can pay?"

No chance at all.

The new invention may make it possible for small towns, whose yearly taxes would not pay for three performances of the Metropolitan Opera Company, to see and hear the greatest stars in the world for ten cents.

When the Edison talking invention is coupled to the Edison moving picture invention, presented in an "Edison" theatre, in which the audience sits in Edison concrete chairs, to which they come in Edison storage battery cars, which are summoned after the theatre by Edison signals—well, what chance will the Theatrical Powers have, anyhow?

No chance at all.

* * * *

It can be assumed that the moving picture provides as perfect an illusion as the stage does, and if the phonograph can reproduce the human voice or sound of musical instruments or any noise with exact accuracy, the theatres would yet be in the field, providing that personal element which the most ingenious of inventors have not been able to wean away a certain popular preference for. But it is unlikely that the Theatrical Promoters would be content to stay entrenched behind such an advantage. They are more likely to take up this talking moving picture machine as a means for greatly enlarging their territory, meeting a wider appeal; catching tons of dependable dimes where now they are gleaning undependable dollars.

Instead of waiting a year or two for a successful play to come along, the "provinces" might be seeing and hearing it within a week or two after the first performance.

The Theatrical Powers are cautiously exploring Filmland. They are finding many interesting, many profitable things in a heretofore neglected realm.

The vital mistake for them is that the exploration expeditions did not start several years ago.

"We have too many censors," was the terse statement of Mayor Henry T Hunt, of Cincinnati, in comment upon Mayor Baker's scheme of moving picture censorship in Cleveland. "I do not believe there is any need of such a censor in Cincinnati," he continued. "This office is in constant touch with the National Board of Censorship and we are constantly advised of any film on its way here that is objectionable."

All of which goes to show that Mayor Henry T. Hunt is sensible.

Cincinnati and Cleveland both elected reform mayors last year. Mayor Hunt and Mayor Baker are of about the same age. Mayor Hunt is a Democrat. So is Mayor Baker.

Mayor Hunt has demolished a nationally notorious political machine.

Mayor Baker has strengthened a political machine.

The Cleveland mayor recently appointed a censor of moving picture plays. The political reward went to one R. O. Bartholomew, late of Shelby, O. Mr. Bartholomew immediately announced that his "assistant" would be one H. K. Hunter. The assistant brings to his new duties the important qualifications of "sociological expert" and "former athletic instructor."

Oh, yes, Mr. Bartholomew graduated from the Shelby, O., high school!

* * * *

The cost of the censorship theory of Mayor Baker will be borne by the moving picture proprietors. They will pay Mr. Bartholomew, late of Shelby, and Mr. Hunter, "former athletic instructor," fifty cents per film.

Sure, the exhibitors pay; what's the matter with you?

After the first day's work as censor, Mr. Bartholomew announced that "too much caressing" cannot be shown in Cleveland's moving picture theatres. He will also, so he announced to the reporters, insist on "a moral." "Being a censor is simply having a conscientious idea of what should be shown and not allowing sordid or suggestive scenes to remain. I know when I think a picture play is degrading, much as I would recognize a right or wrong act in every-day life," stated Mr. B.

The very first day he ordered scenes eliminated from several films and the title of one film, "To Hell and Back" he termed "shocking"! He suggested "A Bad Dream" instead.

Why not "An Exasperating Nightmare"?

Every afternoon Mr. Bartholomew and Mr. Hunter will pass on the pictures. Their word is law for the two hundred or more moving pictures in the sixth city of the United States. "All Pictures Passed by Six City Censors" will be a sign displayed in all picture theatres pursuant to an intimation from Bartholomew, who says: "We propose to have only good and elevating pictures in our city."

And the Cleveland Plain-Dealer, back of Mayor Baker's administration, rushes to the defense of the censorship plans and editorially states: "If the experience proves successful the plan will doubtless be copied by other cities."

The "experiment" will not prove satisfactory.

Mr. Bartholomew's wide breadth of knowledge of the great art of Cinematography, gained in that dear Shelby, O., will remain to waste its sweetness on the Sixth City's air.

We extend our sympathy to Cleveland exhibitors.

* * * *

Now here is something that Censor Bartholomew did not think of but, strange to relate, it is a good idea. The Exhibitors' League of Cleveland has appointed a board of poster censors from its membership which will pass on all pictorial advertising. Sensational and cheap methods of advertising are to be condemned. Lurid posters give many a wrong conception of the pictures and lead to the appointment to responsible offices of unknown and unqualified men who try to "censor" the films. We have urged for a year past the elimination of the misleading and sensational posters and banners. The public will be quick to appreciate the action of exhibitors in discriminating against sensational advertising methods. The manufacturers, many of them, are issuing artistic and conservative posters for their releases. Unfortunately, there is always the minority which will not or can not understand that a higher standard is just as essential for the outside of the theatre as the inside. The Cleveland exhibitors are to be congratulated on their crusade against the lurid poster, and like action will soon be taken all over the Middle West.

* * * *

Governor Cox and officers of the Ohio League of Exhibitors conferred January 22 on the appointment of a state censor of moving pictures. Cox favored the plan in his first message to the legislature. This plan will do away with municipal administrative appointments of unknown and oftentimes incompetent censors. However, we do not believe that the exhibitors should be compelled to pay the salary of a state censor. Neither are we of the opinion that a state censor is a prime necessity for Ohio.

SATAN AT HIPPODROME

The finest of Ambrosio features up to date was presented at the Hippodrome on Sunday night, January 26th, to an enthusiastic audience. This excellent production, the state rights of which have been secured by A. Berg, of the Supreme Feature Film Company, of 64 East Fourteenth street, New York City, for the State of New York, is entitled "Satan" and is presented in four parts.

A brief review of "Satan" appeared in this magazine a short time ago, before the film had had a public appearance, and it is with even more enthusiasm that we handle the subject at this writing. Granting that "Satan" is photographically a splendid production, its greatest hold on public sentiment comes from the fact that its lesson is deep, that it touches every human individual. It is a study in the evil influences, emotions and desires which beset each and every one of us. Two hundred thousand dollars, it is said, is the cost of production of this film, which took four months of continuous work to complete.

Mario Bannard is the name of the remarkable actor who has so splendidly portrayed the character of Satan. And although the work of this man is so remarkable, there are others appearing in the picture who, in the small parts they play, stand out equally well—Judas Iscariot, for instance.

There is a question open as to the authenticity of one or two of the scenes in the life of our Saviour. The placing of the scene representing the triumphal entry of Christ into Jerusalem, comes a little too early in the story, and in the betrayal scene he is pictured as being alone, while according to Bible history there were some three or four of his disciples with him. These inaccuracies disturb but little, if any, the general good effect of the whole, and it is without doubt one of the finest features that has been presented in America.

PILOT FILM CORPORATION'S FIRST RELEASE

The first release of the Pilot Film Corporation was exhibited to the press and a number of film people on Friday last. "The Blacksmith's Story," which is the title of said release, is a well chosen subject, and is an adaptation from the poem by that name, written by Frank Olive. It is one of peculiarly pathetic circumstances, treating of the marriage of the blacksmith with a woman whose husband was supposed to have been killed in the battle of Malvern Hill. For five years they lived happily together. A child was born, and the two were wrapped up in the joy of caring for it. But alas! there came an end to this chapter of their existence. The former husband of the woman only reported dead appears. She goes away with him, taking the child with her, and the blacksmith is left alone.

This picture is very artistically produced and beautifully photographed.

THE OLD FLAG RESTORED

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Copyright—All Rights Reserved)

Synopsis

DURING the last year of the Civil War a young boy of eighteen, John Mead, living at Petersburg, Va., joined the Confederate army and took part in fights around that part of the country.

During one battle with a New York regiment the standard bearer is shot and killed. John Mead instantly springs to the front and, raising the blood-stained flag aloft, leads his comrades forward.

The soldiers fall thick and fast on both sides, but the boy is not touched until he is felled by a coarse, burly Union soldier's blow. This seems to turn the tide, for immediately the Confederates are beaten back, the flag captured, and John Mead taken prisoner.

He is taken to New York and there sees, hanging in the quarters of the Colonel, his own flag. He asks for it but is, of course, refused. He is paroled and permitted to walk around the garden. The Colonel has a young daughter of fifteen. She sees the boy walking alone in the garden, and feeling sorry for him, she talks to him. They soon become lovers in a boy and girl way.

The Colonel discovers their meetings and forbids his daughter to see the boy. This, however, does not stop their meetings. John is freed at the end of the war and decides to stay in New York and make his fortune.

Ten years later, having prospered, he asks the Colonel's daughter, to whom he has remained faithful, to marry him. She consents, but as the Colonel is still opposed to the young man, they are secretly married and go back to his old home in Virginia. The girl is disowned by her father for her disobedience.

In due time they have a family, the oldest son of which, when he reaches a proper age, is sent to West Point. While there he meets a New York girl and marries her as soon as he is graduated from the Academy.

The young man's parents look kindly on his early marriage, remembering their own stolen happiness.

Twelve years after this marriage, the old Colonel, one day driving in his automobile, runs into a buggy. No damage is done but a little girl ten years old, who is in the buggy with her father, is very much frightened. The Colonel takes the child into his arms to comfort her, and is struck by the likeness to his own daughter who married against his wishes so many years before. He asks the child's name and is told and introduced to the father, whom he has not before noticed. Hearing the name, Mead, and seeing the likeness of the father to the man who married his daughter against his will, as well as the resemblance of the child to his daughter, the Colonel knows he is talking to his grandson and great-granddaughter. His heart softens and he invites them to his home.

At his home the child sees on the wall the old Confederate flag. She asks about it and the old man tells her the story. Then the child asks for the flag, which he gives her. The Colonel learns that the R. E. Lee Camp of the Confederate Veterans of the Old 17th Virginia Regiment is at Alexandria, Va., just at that time. He takes the child and her father and a number of G. A. R. men—members of his own company in the Civil War—to Alexandria.

There, at the camp, the child, at the direction of her great-grandfather, gives the flag to her grandfather, the very man from whom the flag was taken forty-six years before.

John Mead then presents the flag to the remaining members of his regiment amidst cheers of both Blue and Gray. When the presentation is over a carriage is driven up and an old lady of sixty-one gets out of it. The child sees her and running to her, kisses her, and then takes her by the hand to the old Colonel. He knows it is his daughter, although he has not seen her for so long. While he is holding his daughter in his arms, John Mead comes up to them and the old man holds out his hand to him. At last he has forgiven them.

Scene 1

The front porch of a Virginia home in 1865.

John Mead, a boy of eighteen, is bidding his mother good-bye as he is leaving to join the 17th Virginia Regiment. His mother is weeping and clinging to him. The boy embraces her tenderly but tells her he must go.

Scene 2

A small battlefield.

Fighting is going on between the 17th Virginia regiment and a New York regiment. The fighting is hot and the soldiers are falling on both sides. Suddenly the standard bearer is shot down and the flag falls to the ground. Instantly John Mead springs to the front and raising the soiled and torn flag, goes forward with a shout. His comrades follow him and for a moment it seems that the victory is won for the Confederates. But a brutal Union soldier knocks John Mead down, wounds him, and the flag is captured. Then the tide is turned and the Confederates are driven back. John Mead is taken prisoner by the New York regiment.

Scene 3

A room in the quarters of the Colonel of the New York regiment. The Confederate flag hangs on the wall. The Colonel is there. John Mead is brought in. The Colonel gives orders to parole him and gives him the freedom of the garden. John Mead is only a boy and asks impulsively for the flag. The Colonel laughs kindly and shakes his head, and the boy goes out.

Scene 4

A garden with a high wall around it.

John Mead is walking around disconsolately.

Scene 5

The Colonel's room—same as Scene 3.

The Colonel's young daughter, a girl of fifteen, comes bouncing in and kisses her father. He draws her down onto his lap and kisses her in return. An under officer comes in to speak to the Colonel and he tells his daughter to run away.

Scene 6

The garden.

The Colonel's daughter comes into the garden and discovers the boy-soldier. Her curiosity overcomes her modesty and she begins a conversation with him. Soon he tells her his story.

When the Colonel comes into the garden a little later he finds them laughing and talking together like two old friends. He is very much shocked and orders his daughter into the house at once. As she leaves she turns and smiles at the boy, who, in return, makes her a very low bow.

Scene 7

Two months later.

The garden.

John Mead is there walking about. The Colonel's daughter slips through a small opening in the hedge and stands waiting. John sees her and brightens up at once. He goes to her and they embrace and kiss one another.

While they are sitting on a bench with their arms around each other, the Colonel comes upon them. He is very angry and orders the girl to go into the house at once. She does so and he at once gives the boy his pardon and tells him he is free, and for him to leave and never see his daughter again.

Scene 8

Ten years later.

A room in the Colonel's home. On the wall, among other trophies of war, is the old Confederate flag. The Colonel is seated in his armchair reading. A servant announces John Mead. The young man is now twenty-eight and has prospered. He tells the Colonel that he has remained faithful to his girl-sweetheart and that they wish to marry.

The Colonel is angry and sends for his daughter, who is now twenty-five. When she comes her father asks her if she has been keeping up her acquaintance with the young man. She reluctantly acknowledges she has, but she tells him she loves John Mead. Her father tells her to leave the room. As she turns to leave John Mead opens the door for her. As she is about to pass through the door he takes her hand and bows low over it. As he does so he slips a note into her hand. After the girl has left the room he turns to her father, bows and goes out.

Scene 9

The bedroom of the Colonel's daughter. The girl hurries into the room, hastily locks the door, and as hastily unfolds the note given her by her sweetheart. She reads:

Dearest: I shall be waiting to-night at twelve at the south entrance to the garden. If you love me as you avow, come.

Yours until death,

JOHN MEAD.

The girl holds the note to her breast for a moment, then excitedly sets to work to gather together a few of her belongings.

Scene 10

An entrance to the garden.

A carriage stands waiting with a negro driver. In the shadow of the wall stands John Mead wrapped in a long cloak. The gate opens and in a moment his sweetheart is in his arms. Quickly he puts her in the carriage and they are driven away.

Scene 11

The Virginia home, as shown in Scene 1.

John Mead's mother, now middle-aged, is standing expectantly on the porch. A carriage drives up and John and his bride alight. The mother playfully shakes her finger at them and then gathers them into her arms.

Scene 12

A room in the Mead house.

John Mead and his wife are there. A negro servant brings a telegram and hands it to Mrs. Mead. She opens it and reads:

"Consider that you are no longer my daughter.

"Henry Van Duyler."

For a moment the girl doesn't speak and lets the telegram fall listlessly from her hands. Then she turns impulsively to her husband and puts her arms around his neck. He will make up for all she has lost.

Scene 13

Ten years later.

The lawn of the Mead home.

John Mead and his wife are sitting together watching their three children play. One is a boy of nine and the others two little girls of four and six.

Scene 14

Ten years later.

The Meads are bidding good-bye to their son, now nineteen, as he is about to depart for West Point Academy.

Scene 15

A ball at West Point. The cadets and young ladies are dancing. Young Mead is paying special attention to one young lady and she is not displeased with him.

Scene 16

The Mead home.

Mrs. Mead is seated on the porch. Mr. Mead comes up the steps and hands her a letter from their son. It reads:

"Dear Mother and Father:

"Everything is all right. I have received my appointment to the West. Please forgive me for being so hasty, but I was married last night very quietly to the young lady I have spoken of. Now I can take her with me. I want your blessing.

"Your affectionate son,

"JOHN."

At first the mother is inclined to weep, but the father reminds her of their marriage and she smiles as she kisses him.

Scene 17

A telegraph office.

John Mead enters and sends the following telegram:

"Mother and I, remembering our own marriage, forgive and send blessing.

"JOHN MEAD."

Scene 18

Twelve years later.

The exterior of Colonel Van Duyler's house. He is now a very old man—about eighty-six—but is well preserved. An automobile stands in front of the house. The old Colonel comes down the steps and is driven away in the car.

Scene 19

A road in a suburb of New York.

Young John Mead is driving in a buggy with his little ten-year-old daughter. Suddenly the old Colonel's automobile comes up behind the buggy and runs into it. No damage is done but the child is greatly frightened. The old man leaves his car at once and comes forward to apologize. When he sees how frightened the child is, he is so taken up with soothing her that he almost forgets the man.

At last when he asks the child's name and learns that it is Mead, and sees her striking resemblance to his daughter, he turns to the man. When he sees that he resembles his son-in-law he tells him who he is, and finally asks them to his home. He takes them in his car and goes back to town.

Scene 20

The room in the Colonel's home where the trophies of war hang—the old flag among them. The Colonel, young Mead and the little girl enter.

The young man and the child see the flag at once. Mead knows the story of it and looks at it almost with reverence. The child asks the Colonel to tell her the story of it. He does so and she asks him to give her the flag. He does so. A servant enters with the evening paper.

While the old man and the child are talking of the flag, Mead casually glances at the paper. He sees that the Veterans of the Old 17th Virginia Regiment are in camp at Alexandria, Va. He shows it to the old Colonel as a peculiar coincidence.

When the Colonel sees it he stands thinking for a while and then he says, "I know what I shall do. The child shall return the flag to her grandfather and he shall give it back to his regiment."

Then he rings for a servant, and seating himself at his desk, begins writing rapidly.

Scene 22

The R. E. Lee Camp at Alexandria, Va.

The Confederate Veterans are in one group and among them is John Mead, the elder, now about sixty-four. In another group stand the old Colonel, holding the little girl by the hand, and the G. A. R. men who came with him. Near them stands the child's father. The child holds in her hand the old flag, rolled up. At a word from the old Colonel she unfolds the flag, and holding it as high as she can, she steps over to her grandfather, the elder John Mead, and gives it to him. He turns and presents it to his comrades amidst great cheering from both sides.

There is then a general handshaking between the two sides. Everyone wishes to shake the Colonel's hand and to pet the child. As the crowd begins to disperse a carriage drives up and the old Colonel's daughter alights. The little girl sees her and runs to her. She takes her by the hand and brings her to the Colonel, who takes her in his arms. She is sixty-one and he is eighty-six, but. to him she is still his little girl, and he is forgiving her after long years. Then the old man holds out his hand to his son-in-law. The little girl is so happy she runs to her father and jumps into his arms.

Extemporaneous Improvization vs. Memorization

In spite of the fact of having expressed my views on improvisation rather pointedly in the past, there are still some who would fain convince me to the contrary, for which reason I take up the subject again, dealing in facts only as I have found them and as you will find them if you take the time and patience to test them. I can assure all that I am only too willing to be convinced of anything that will be creative of better picture music, for which reason I have visited hundreds of large and small theatres with a view of finding some commendable results.

The only nearly good results were found where it could be heard that the player employed a method of memorization, in which cases the music was commendable, the only possible criticism being the setting of the music to the picture, which I contend is a fault of the producer of film, not the musician. After an exhaustive search to find good picture music, I can again say with a clear conscience that extemporaneous improvisation as practised in picture playing is not only valueless but destructive.

Taking up the facts as you find them when you enter a picture theatre, wherein the method of extemporaneous improvisation is in vogue, you will immediately note that at all times when the musician is not preluding (he calls that improvisation also, but don't believe it) he is playing a few bars of many compositions interjoining them in every indifferent way possible. At times their memory fails them in this joining of themes and the noises that ensue are really amusing to one musically inclined.

The following street corner conversation will forcibly explain this so-called improvisation and I can vouch for its authenticity, having been party B in the conversation.

A. Do you play music to the pictures?

B. Yes. When the pictures are very good, I set up a programme as good as I can in the time allowed.

A. I never do, but my manager engaged a violinist, and I must use music now and I hate it.

The party A is known to me to be a good musician, and is simply suffering from picturitis, which is similar to the hook-worm, or in other words, the pictures are ruining him in a musical sense. The further fact regarding improvisation will prove that in picture playing it is nothing more than a method resulting from an overtaxed brain and confused memory, which in itself is sufficient reason for the miserable results attained.

Knowing that the picture music has not improved with the use of this method, I have experimented on what I will term "memorization," which will be productive of better music, while it will be far from the best results possible to attain. The fact that in memorizing your brain matter will place a limit as to repertoire renderable alone will prove that the best results cannot be obtained even in that manner. In memorizing you will find that after playing a certain number of compositions by memory, you will crowd out another each time you memorize a new one, leaving your repertoire at a standstill so far as numbers are concerned.

Again, the similarity in many numbers will confuse you and unless you refer to the printed copy from time to time the memorized composition will hardly be recognized after a time, when of course you will have the option of calling it improvisation. Again, we must confess that, after a continued repetition of these memorized numbers, our musical instinct is destroyed, that it is next to impossible to give a good rendition.

It is hardly probable that any one could play by memory more than fifty or sixty numbers, such as would be good for the pictures, and play them well enough for public rendition. I do not include songs or rags in this number, for I find that all who specialize in memorizing these have no other repertoire whatsoever, and I am positive that I could not play one of these late rag songs from memory, still in a programme containing two comedy pictures or one comedy and one descriptive, I play from forty to fifty of all the latest song numbers as one selection, and in the course of a week I use from 100 to 125, playing from professional copies. I would not attempt to memorize these numbers, knowing full well it would destroy my other repertoire.

Therefore you can get better music results by memorization when done with the necessary forethought and care in a continual weeding out and adding of new numbers to such memorized repertoire.

You may say this is theory and I say it is theory, for I know only too well that the best picture music will result from a method induced by one or more of such theories.

Allowing the above to be, to a certain extent, theory, which it will remain until the producers show some concerted inclination toward better musical results, still the foregoing has been productive, in my case, of better results with less effort, while it lacks much of being perfect. Perfection is a matter that belongs to the production of film, not the musician, and the manufacturers alone can attain it.

The following method of memorization will help you and make the work more simple. All pianists have some numbers which appealed to them in their years of study, the memorization of which is to them a natural consequence. I would suggest that they retain these and in memorizing new numbers, concentrate on the dramatic, which is always important, the situations and scenes in the picture requiring such musical interpretation, usually are thrown on the screen in so short a space of time that it is not practical to find the necessary printed musical number on your stand if it were there. By memorizing a necessary and sufficient dramatic repertoire and following the advice given in my article appearing in issue of November 30, 1912, as to placing of musical numbers on your stand for certain pictures in your programme, you will find that you can not only give better musical results but you will be able to use a much larger repertoire.

It is peculiar, but nevertheless a fact, that while you can memorize but a small repertoire, you can in a very short time familiarize yourself with hundreds of numbers sufficiently so that an occasional glance at your stand and music is sufficient to play them well. In following such a method you will also find that you can make use of a much better class of music, changing your programmes every few days, and your music will not become tiresome to the audience, for most picture theatres are, so to speak, for family entertainment and are patronized by the same audience continually. This is the only really practical method that I have been able to locate and found to be productive of better music under the present conditions, which, to say the least, are lamentable.

Unless the picture musician makes some effort at the present time to improve himself and his music, he will suddenly find himself obsolete when genuine picture music becomes a reality, and his relegation to other ways and means is better explained in the following quotation:

"Therefore he became a minister, lawyer, doctor or musician, and the vocation of cobbler, butcher, baker and farmer consequently suffered."

Dealing with more facts, I will recite actual happenings during a vaudeville and picture performance in one of the largest theatres of this kind in the city, the substance of which should be of interest to all interested in the picture, musically and otherwise. Upon my entering the theatre, a picture was being projected and all was quiet. After taking my seat, two vaudeville acts followed, each receiving more or less unfavorable comment from the audience in different parts of the theatre. To say the least, I was greatly surprised in seeing no efforts made to quash this clamor. After these two acts a "Kalem Drama" was projected and perfect quiet again reigned. The orchestra played a selection from a Broadway production during part of the picture and all went well. Two more vaudeville acts followed this picture. The first, being an exceptionally good dancing act, was well received. The second act received the full benefit of the withheld clamor. A Biograph, "The Burglar's Dilemma," was then projected, and quiet was again restored and continued during the entire picture, regardless of the fact that the orchestra played irrelevant numbers during its entire production, which is better explained when I tell you they played an Arthur Pryor march containing comedy slide trombone work all through the struggle, supposed death, burglary, arrest and well into the "third degree" scenes. Good picture to stand up under its musical drubbing. Again two vaudeville acts followed, with the same results, and I quietly walked to the balcony to find the conditions the same as in the orchestra. Next was a Vitagraph split-reel comedy, "The Dandy," and "All for a Girl." The orchestra began playing a lengthy selection from an Italian grand opera, which was very difficult, at least for that orchestra. It reminded me very much of a Monday rehearsal, which it could have been, the day and performance in question being Monday matinee. Nevertheless, the first half of the reel was projected in perfect quiet, but as the musical selection was very long and became more and more difficult, the second half of the reel I felt sure must be doomed, and so it did happen that the audience produced more than a necessary amount of repartee dialogue with which to embellish the picture. There was no further reason why I should continue there any longer, so I made my way slowly to the street. Can you imagine a poorly rendered Italian grand opera selection and a Vitagraph comedy? Can you blame the audience? It is not for me to give you the whys and wherefores of all this, but I have given you the facts just as they were and I leave you to your own deductions.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

A special meeting of Local No. 1 was held January 27 last, at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street, New York City, for the purpose of receiving the final report of the arrangements committee for the coming entertainment and ball at Palm Garden, February 10, 1913. By vote, the meeting was halted long enough to allow for the obligating of new members, and it may be said right here, that to have fifty new members enroll in three meetings is quite some record, and it speaks better than any wordy argument, how well our organization is progressing, and so far this little acorn organization has shown that it will grow to a sturdy oak.

The grand annual entertainment and ball of the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union, No. 1, of New York, Inc., will be held on February 10, 1913, at Palm Garden, Fifty-eighth street, near Lexington avenue. The arrangements committee has left no stone unturned to make it one grand success. Not only have they secured, as has been stated in previous issues of this column John Bunny, of the Vitagraph Players, and Miss Pearl White, of the Crystal Films, to lead the grand march, but also an array of vaudeville talent that would make the big time vaudeville managers sit up and take notice. As a piece de resistance of the entertainment, John Rickards, the secretary of the committee, secured Mr. Ralph Ince, of the Vitagraph Players, to give his lifelike impersonation of Abraham Lincoln, using as a vehicle for this impersonation the Vitagraph's magnificent Civil War drama, "The Seventh Son." The act will take 55 minutes in its presentation, and Mr. Ince will be assisted in this playlet by Mrs. Mary Maurice, as the mother, and Mr. Richard Rosson as a lieutenant; also special scenery will be used for this production.

The committee has the assurance that all the leading stars of picturedom, who are now playing in and around New York, will be present. And whether you can trip the light fantastic (or in plain Scotch "spiel")

Now, folks, step right up to the box office and get your tickets, and join in raising old Harry at the one big red letter event of the year.

TO ALL LOCALS OF MOVING PICTURE OPERATORS OF THE INTERNATIONAL ALLIANCE THEATRICAL STAGE EMPLOYEES OF U. S. AND CANADA.

Dear Sirs and Brothers:

I respectfully lay before you my opinion as a moving picture operator and the business representative of the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1, in regard to the coming convention to take place at Seattle, Washington, this summer, at which you, my honorable brothers or delegates, will investigate the misrule of Local No. 35, I. A. T. S. E., toward their former Auxiliary, a body of 500 men now an organization protected under a state charter, waiting for you to assist us in our efforts for justice and to a direct charter of the I. A. T. S. E. of U. S. and Canada.

I believe the moving picture operators are better off for the absence of such men as the spot light workers of Local No. 35 from the motion picture industry, inasmuch that they do not understand such projection and are not required to be licensed by city or Federal authorities, and further, that they are holding a charter which calls for more than one profession, contrary to rulings of the American Federation of Labor, and are a detrimental organ to the moving picture industry, where so much life, limb and property is at stake, for spot lamp workers do not have to undergo the examination of a moving picture operator, whose task is more difficult and responsible, owing to the highly inflammable material they must handle and therefore are more superior craftsmen than the spot lamp operators.

I congratulate you, brothers, in advance on your efforts to bring out the facts and I urge you furthermore to the most drastic investigation of the system which was in force, also the tactics and procedure when we were an auxiliary to Local No. 35, I. A. T. S. E.

I assure you that the members of my organization will feel very much relieved and will greatly rejoice if the work of the delegates at the convention of the I. A. T. S. E., which will be held in Seattle, shall emphasize the facts: two distinct trades, such as spot light workers, can not be controlled in a charter which gives them the right to operate moving picture machines, or, in other words, two different crafts covered by one charter.

It is our opinion if this sort of charter rights can prevail or continue to exist then the bill posters will have to be an auxiliary to the paper hangers' union, for they carry a pail of paste, brush, and smoother down brush, the same material as the paper hanger, and the harness-maker will have to be an auxiliary to the shoe makers' union because they handle leather and other material in that trade.

Assuring you of our confidence in your intentions and in that of the delegates that will attend at the next I. A. T. S. E. convention and trusting that the results of your work will be of such a character as to eliminate the monopolizing and combining of various trades under one charter as now exists, now and in future

I am yours fraternally,
RALPH J. KNASTER,
Business Representative,

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

In the Patent Office the objectionable practice of allowing members of the examining corps to visit points outside the District of Columbia, at the expense of applicants or attorneys, in order to acquaint them with the working of devices represented by pending applications for patent, has been discontinued, and under an appropriation made by Congress, entitled "For investigating the question of public use," the expenses of these trips are now paid by the government, as recommended by Commissioner Moore. It is obvious that under the present arrangement the opportunity for criticism, which obtained years ago, has been removed. It may be stated, however, that in all instances of this kind the policy of the office is to grant authority for these inspections only where the good of the service demands them. In any case, the stigma of suspicion of undue influence or solicitation is removed, and the Examing Corps left free and unbiased so that all decisions may be unqualifiedly rendered on the merits alone. The affairs of the Patent Office have been and are being conducted with the most rigid economy, notwithstanding the enormous surplus to its credit in the United States Treasury. Upon recommendation of Commissioner Moore the publication of the library edition of specifications and drawings has been abolished, as no longer desirable or useful, and this has resulted in a saving equivalent to about $65,000 annually.

Patent No. 1,048,160, issued to John S. Higgins, of Auburn, Maine, relates to photographic printing frames, and particularly to that class of frames used in the operation technically known as exposing "developing paper," or successively printing from one or two negatives, making secondary negatives or positives and similar work; and the primary object is to provide a frame with a hinged backboard in two parts for convenience in inserting negatives and printing paper, and accurately adjusting them with relation to each other; also to provide means whereby the hinged back-board may be closed and locked at practically one movement and automatically raised to a position entirely out of the way of the hands of the operator, and of the negatives or paper to be handled. Claim is made to a frame adapted to receive one or more glass plates or negatives, having one side bar cut down to the level of the top of the negative, a backboard divided longitudinally to said frame, the first section of said backboard hinged to said frame and the two sections hinged to each other, means for clamping said backboard down upon said negatives and releasing the same a wire spring connected with said frame and to the first section of said backboard, and adapted to open the same, a wire spring connected to said first and second sections of said backboard and adapted to fold the second section back upon the first section, one end of each of said springs being coiled around a pin fixed to said first section of backboard, and said springs so interlocked as to operate in conjunction with each other in the manner and for the purpose specified.

Edison's storage battery has won for him the Rathenau medal for the best electrical process or device for safeguarding health, on account of its adaptability as a source of power supply for mines, submarine boats, and factories where explosives are made. This is the first award of this medal to an American.

The perennial crusade of the New York Civic League against Sunday filmdom, is again in evidence in its bill introduced in Albany through Senator Stillwell. The fact that the electric theatre "draws" where the pulpit fails, would indicate that the film will eventuate into the greatest moral and educational factor in modern civilization if properly developed in that direction. Certainly the worst of the "raw" and demoralizing films are now practically eliminated, and while there is much that cannot be condoned in the way of senseless production, the art has made extraordinary advancement in the diffusion of light and knowledge, and the elevating of the masses to a higher standard of thought and understanding. The Cinematograph should not only be the poor man's library, college, art school, and scientific institute, but his "globe trotter" and "cosmopolitanizer" also; and with synchronous sound effects available in the near future who will say that an ideal Sunday entertainment is not forthcoming. Only recently the Rev. Dr. Harry W. Jones, famous in the Spanish-American war as "the fighting chaplain" of the United States battleship Texas, and the recipient of a special gold medal from Congress for his bravery, resigned his pastorate of the First Reformed Church in Valley Stream, L. I., and is now engaged in the exploitation of moving pictures of the class known as educational and religious—having become convinced, as he says, that the moving picture which preaches a sermon is far more efficacious than a thousand sermons delivered from the pulpit.

"A court rules that Edison did not invent the moving picture. Well, that's only one acquittal; he still remains to be tried on the charge of inventing the phonograph."—Columbia State.

Patent No. 1,049,379, issued to Paul J. Marks, of Rochester, N. Y., assignor to Eastman Kodak Company, a corporation, relates to photographic shutters of the automatic type, and is designed to provide simple and convenient means for automatically locking the shutter in its closed position, whereby the blades are prevented from jarring open and causing fogging of the film or plate, and are also prevented from rebounding when actuated to closed position; also to provide for the automatic release of such locking device coincidently with the operation of the parts whose movements cause the opening of the shutter. The device embodies the combination with a blade and an actuator therefor, one of said parts being provided with a projecting abutment and a motor acting on the actuator to normally close the shutter, of a latch, a spring for moving the same into the path of the abutment on one side of the latter when the shutter is closed to retain the blade in that position a master member movable into and out of co-operation with the abutment on the opposite side thereof to successively open the blade against the tension of the motor and then release the same, said master member and the abutment being provided with cam faces, allowing one part to slide over the other during the setting movement of the master member, the latter being operatively connected to the latch to displace the latch from one side of the abutment as the master member moves into engagement with the other side during its setting movement.

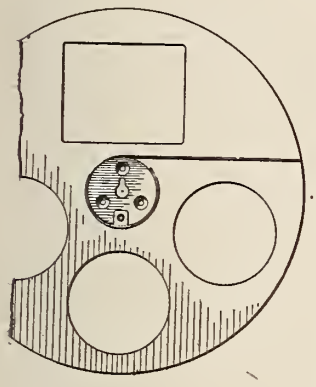
H MY! Puck says "Deaf-mutes have again been shocked by reading the lip motions of actors in moving picture plays, films which were thought to be highly proper and edifying. This item shows up in the daily news with great regularity, and if the lines which the actors speak are as naughty as the deaf-mutes say they are, the talented company ought to quit making movies and get a New York engagement."



Patent No. 1,048,270 to Sidney McL. Aughinbaugh, of Chambersburg, Pa., is for an improved fastening device for film reels, designed primarily to permit a moving picture film to be applied or disconnected with facility to a reel used with kinetoscopes, and which is adted to allow the usual or any preferred form of end plates to be used in conjunction therewith. The claim is for a hub having a recess in each face thereof, a frictional gripping device comprising a plate, a lug on each end of said plate having an eye therein, said lugs adapted to be received into the recesses in the hub so as to permit a fastening element to be passed through the eyes, whereby the plate may be attached to the hub, and a finger of spring material provided upon each side of the plate midway the ends thereof, each finger being curved to conform to the curvature of the hub and having the free end thereof curved upwardly, whereby the end of a film may be readily inserted between one of the fingers and the hub.

If the mountain will not come to Mahomet, Mahomet must go to the mountain. For this reason a progressive Oregonian has mounted a complete motion picture outfit upon a motor truck, adapted to travel here and there amid truly rural environments where electric plants are not available; and the enterprise has eventuated successfully. The itinerant show-plant weighs about 1,500 pounds, including a 25-hp. gasolene motor, and a 110-volt dynamo for producing the electric juice for film projection.

The case of YESS vs. YESS (99 Northwestern Rep. 687) sounds as though two affirmatives were equivalent to a negative. Certainly one controverts the other.

Commissioner Moore has decided that the Irish Industrial Development Association, established to promote Irish trade and Irish commerce through the medium of a general trade-mark, the use of which is granted to Irish manufacturers proving themselves worthy thereof, has the right to oppose the adoption and registration of such mark in this country, notwithstanding the fact that said association is not actually engaged in the manufacture of goods itself, and hence not entitled to registration under our law, since it is well settled that it is not necessary in order to sustain an opposition proceedings that it should appear that the opposer is entitled to register the mark. It is sufficient that the mark should have been used in some manner analogous to trade-mark use and that the opposer has such an interest therein that he would sustain or be likely to sustain actual damage by the registration of the mark by another.

This strictly Hibernian mark is of peculiar circular design and bears Gaelic script, which translated means "Made in Ireland."

As noted in our report of December 7, 1912, there is also a British Empire Trade-Mark Association for the approval and guarantee of goods manufactured in the British empire, the mark used being both general and specific in character in that it is also used to designate clearly the particular part of the empire in which the goods are produced.

WASHINGTON, D. C.

The Maryland Theatre is greatly improved in its change of dress from red to pale green with white and gold trimmings, which was the first movement of Manager Johnson after he assumed control. This house offers a feature daily, together with other films of the independent service.

* * * *

Mme. Sarah Bernhardt in "Queen Elizabeth" had a run of a week at the Casino, drawing capacity houses at all performances. That this is a wonderfully artistic play by a wonderful actress was highly appreciated by all.

* * * *

Tom Moore continues to add attractions to the Garden Theatre. It has long been acknowledged as the feature house of picturedom in Washington, with a good orchestra of several pieces. Now its music will be furnished by members of the United States Marine Band, who are best able to present the proper musical settings to the big features appearing at the Garden. This has been found especially necessary in the filming of "Parsifal," that Wagnerian opera of wonderful orchestration, "Cleopatra," "The Miracle," the various operas now filmed, and the many military and classic subjects that have been booked for this theatre.

* * * *

J. Boyd Dexter, formerly manager of the Maryland. has now assumed the house management of the Garden, the largest all-picture theatre here, with a seating capacity of more than a thousand. Tom Moore feels himself especially fortunate in securing the services of such a right-hand man, and in speaking on the subject remarked, "With Mr. Dexter here, I can be relieved of many details and when I say for a thing to be done, I know it will be done without further worry." Mr. Dexter is a pioneer picture man of Washington, having served in every branch of the business. Many of the improvements and advances in exchange service, lobby displays, theatre illumination, projection, etc., are due to some primary movement on his part.

The Colonial and Pickwick, offering a feature daily. continue to hold the crowds of "the gay white way" of Pennsylvania avenue. These are of the Brylawski chain of theatres that dot the city in various places.

* * * *

The Royal, Arcade and Acme of the northwest section of the city have become the mecca for picture fans in the residential part. The lights, autos and crowds amply vie with many of the downtown theatres. Manager Adler, of the Arcade, is always happy because the box-office receipts are always good; while Manager Braswell, of the Royal, and Manager Greenburg, of the Acme, always meet you with a smile for the same reason. Good pictures with good music is the standard for all. W. H.

GAUMONT

"SAY, UNCLE!" (Feb. 4).—Lily Doeem is a get-the-money lady. Love with her is more than a mere pastime. She tells her boob sweetheart, A. Lolly Popp, that she wants a pearl necklace and that if he is stingy she will "shake" him and make love to a sausage manufacturer.

Mr. Popp is distracted. He has no money, and his only stock in trade is a mustache and a rich uncle. He doesn't know how to raise money on the mustache, therefore his only alternative is the uncle. He writes to said uncle, in which he tells him that he has a great scheme and that five thousand would float it. Also he writes to his Lily that he has communicated with his old fool of an uncle and that he has told him the "tale" and he hopes that his old uncle will fork out and that Lily will then get the necklace.

Unfortunately, as they will do in comedies, he puts the wrong letter in the wrong envelope. Consequently, the uncle gets the letter which was to he sent to Lily Doeem. Accordingly, when Lolly Popp calls on the uncle to collect the five thousand, uncle is ready to greet him.

The uncle has informed his servant that he is to tell Lolly Popp that he (the uncle) is very nervous, and that Lolly must do nothing to cross him, and must obey his every whim. Lolly Popp, anxious to get the money, is willing to humor him.

The uncle asks Lolly Popp to wheel him around in his wheeling-chair. It is a warm day and Lolly suffers from the heat. Uncle enjoys the wheeling and doesn't seem to mind how far they go. They arrive at a shallow river. Uncle wants to go across. Lolly Popp has on his perfectly good white trousers and his pet tennis shoes. It almost breaks his heart when he has to wade into the wet and push the go-cart ahead of him.

When they arrive on the other side of the river the uncle wants more. He tells Lolly Popp to do it some more, that he likes it. Lolly Popp is almost ready to drop. The hope of the five thousand is his only solace.

At last they return to the house and Lolly Popp feels that he has earned his money, and that he will get it. He sits at the desk and writes a letter to Lily as follows: "The old lobster pays. You will get your necklace." In the room is a large oil painting of the uncle, life size. The uncle has sought to catch his nephew in just such incriminating actions and has moved the picture from the frame. He has seated himself in the space. As Lolly Popp holds up the letter exultantly, the uncle steps out of the picture, as it were, and pinches Lolly on the ear. Whereupon, all dreams of the five thousand and his future as Lily's sweetheart vanish.

AMERICAN

THE FUGITIVE (Feb. 11).—The fugitive was reported in the vicinity and the sheriff, after a hasty call on his sweetheart, gathered his posse and gave hot pursuit. Over the mountains they galloped madly, the fugitive running almost in a circle.

In front of the cabin sat Grace Merriwell, the sheriff's sweetheart, when suddenly before her stood the hunted one. Instantly she recognized her brother and secreted him in the house. The sheriff, tracking his man unfailingly, stopped at the cabin. He entered and the excited girl make known her brother's presence in the house. The sheriff hesitated. It was love or duty, and the sheriff chose love. Taking the fugitive by the hand he bade him secrete himself in another room. The posse entered and all left satisfied with the sheriff's word but Higgins. He, suspicious, went from room to room and, with lightning rapidity, the hunted man changed his hiding place. Taking the star from his breast he threw it on the table, for he knew that his day was over. Between love and duty he had chosen love.

ESSANAY

THE RANCHMAN'S BLUNDER (Feb. 4).—Sam Beasley, foreman of the Double X ranch, complains to Dick Mackclay, the owner, that Jack Harrington is in the habit of abusing the live stock. Harrington is reprimanded. That afternoon, Beasley sees Harrington abusing a horse by jerking the reins and hitting the animal in the face with them. Beasley tells him to quit it; Harrington refuses. Beasley hits Harrington a punch on the jaw. These two men are in love with the ranchman's daughter, Mabel. Mackclay has instructed his daughter to have nothing to do with Beasley. That night Harrington sees Beasley with Mabel. He writes a note to Mackclay and throws it through an open window. Mackclay picks it up and reads that his daughter is with Sam Beasley at the fence, near the big trees. Mackclay goes after him with a shotgun. He discovers that the two have disappeared. In trying to climb the fence the gun is accidentally discharged in his face, wounding him severely. Harrington, hearing the report of the gun, runs to the scene and finds Mackclay in a serious condition. He calls for the cowpunchers. One of them goes for a doctor. Three of them, having been told hy Harrington that Beasley shot Mackclay, scout the surrounding territory for him. The doctor arrives and dresses Mackclay's wounds. Beasley is found in a nearby saloon. He is taken to the home of Mackclay. Mackclay tells the doctor and the boys that Beasley did not shoot him, that the gun was accidentally discharged. In the meantime Harrington, realizing that Mackclay's condition is not as serious as first thought, decides that the best thing he can do is to leave. After hearing Mackclay's statement, the boys go after Harrington. He is brought back to the house, discharged, and ordered off the place. Mackclay appoints Beasley foreman of the ranch and tells the cowpunchers, who have gathered around his bed, that Beasley will be his son-in-law.

PATHE

PATHE'S WEEKLY No. 6 (Feb. 3).

THE PITCHER PLANT (Feb. 4).—This film is a remarkable series of views of a remarkable plant. The pitcher plant grows, as its name suggests, in the form of a pitcher with a lid upon it. It is an unfailing trap for insects, inviting them within its folds and then drowning them in the water it contains. The trapping of flies, bees and other insects is cleverly and clearly demonstrated.

On the same reel:

THE SWEDISH SUBMARINE MANOEUVRES.—An absorbingly interesting film. A film permitting a close inspection of a modern submarine, showing the preparations for the plunge, the submarine submerged and the firing of a torpedo.

A WHITE ROSE (Feb. 5).—Mabel Barlow, a young widow, to avoid meeting a suitor of her father's choosing, goes to visit her friend, Mrs. Jefferson. The widow gives the bride her opinion of men in general. She dares Mrs. Jefferson to test her husband's faithfulness. Jefferson, the storm center of all this, comes home with Captain Harding, an old and long lost acquaintance. He finds a letter asking him to meet a lady admirer in the park and to wear a white rose for identification, and shows it to the gay Captain. Jefferson being married, Harding leaves to meet the mysterious young lady. Jefferson discovers that the Captain has forgotten the white rose, gets one and hurries after him. Mrs. Jefferson sees her husband going out with the white rose and her faith in him collapses. Harding meets the mysterious young lady who immediately gives him her opinion of a married man who flirts. Perplexed, Harding returns to Jefferson's home. He finds Mrs. Jefferson ready to leave her husband. The situation is cleared, however, when Harding enters, wearing a white rose.

THE BEAR HUNTER (Feb. 6).—Iron Spider, an Indian trapper, loves Red Wing, and she accompanies him on many of his hunting trips. On this occasion she meets Eagle Feather, who is searching for a bear which has been seen in the vicinity. Red Wing and Eagle Feather fall in love at first sight, but when Iron Spider returns he orders Eagle Feather away and the latter resumes his hunt for the bear. Eagle Feather is watching for the bear from the brink of a ravine when a figure with an upraised knife lunges at him from behind. Eagle Feather bends low and Iron Spider falls over him and down the steep incline. It is very well done. Red Wing arrives about this time. Eagle Feather tells his story and he and Red Wing descend to the bottom of the ravine where they find Iron Spider dead.

THE FRENCH ARMY MANOEUVRES (Feb. 7).—Regiments of French artillery, infantry, cavalry and an engineering corps go through a mimic war, being opposed by a force of like strength. After being forced to lay temporary telegraph lines, build pontoon bridges and transport the cavalry across the river in small boats, the invading army is successful. The fighting men show remarkable ability and the majority of their feats are of the spectacular sort.

THE PEACE COUNCIL (Feb. 8).—Alice Carroll, the daughter of a white settler, and Little Blackbird, an Indian boy, are playmates. Blackbird breaks Alice's doll and both little hearts are filled with sorrow. Blackbird, seeking to make a new doll for Alice, uproots a section of a cornfield, brings the corn to Alice and together they manufacture a doll. A quarrel over the doll ensues and, to patch it up, Blackbird makes a pipe of peace out of an ear of corn. They both smoke the corn husk and become sick. The damage to the cornfield is discovered by Alice's father and his cowboys. Getting their guns they prepare to wreak vengeance upon the Indians, presuming that they are guilty. As the cowboys and Indians are about to fire upon each other, Alice, with her corn doll, and Blackbird, with his headache, toddle in between the warring factions. The cause of the damaged cornfield is explained and, instead of a battle, there is held a peace council.

THANHOUSER

WHILE MRS. McFADDEN LOOKED OUT (Feb. 7).—Old Mrs. McFadden has a great leaning to looking-out-of-the-window; a harmless habit, to be sure. With most people, that is. For in Mrs. McFadden's instance it was a menace and a danger. She would spend hours at the front window, to the great hurt of her house duties and everything else. She would hang happily over the sill and just look and look. While there was a boy left to roll a hoop in the street below her eyes would roll and rove over the surroundings.

One day the result of her dread weakness all came to a climax. While she kept her window vigil in front, her daughter eloped from the rear. After she went out, the instalment furniture people came in and took back the articles they had furnished her, although she had the money due them right in her purse and would have paid them had she known they were around.

As the lady continues to street gaze a blaze breaks forth in a rear room and, as there are none on hand to quell it, it spreads. The firemen come—by the rear way—and fight the flames valiantly with axe and hose. The latter gives Mrs. McFadden her first intimation that she had better leave the window. A stream from the hose "gets" her in the ear. Then she comes in from out 'o the window. She discovers family history has been making the last time she looked out.

THE PRINCESS AND THE MAN (Feb. 1).—The King of Morania, a petty monarchy, is very unpopular. The people are badly governed and send a petition to their ruler, beseeching him for reform. The petition is presented to the king by two leaders of the people, Markowitz and Brand, and he, angry, tears the petition in two and dismisses the two men. As they go Brand's eyes meet those of the Princess Margaret. Princess and Commoner! The look strikes deep in both!

The princess discovers that her maid, Lisette, has been summoned to a meeting of the revolutionary leaders of the people. She makes the maid take her to the meeting and there, hearing herself denounced, lifts her veil and confronts the men assembled. Brand comes to her defense; Markowitz is against her, and the argument is heated when a squad of soldiers, who had been sent to arrest the leaders, pound at the door. Markowitz is for threatening the life of the princess to secure their own safety, but Brand urges the men to escape by the window and hasten to arouse the people. All escape over the roofs except Brand, the princess and Lisette, who remain to confront the soldiers. When the door is finally battered down the princess takes Brand's arm and walks out, the soldiers falling back dumbfounded. Brand comes into the presence of the king, whom they find alone in his study. He imploringly asks him to right the people's wrongs, but to no avail. Suddenly a servant rushes in and announces the palace has been entered by a great mob. The king goes to the throne, where they are assembled. The leader of the people begs him to consider their wrongs. He at first refuses. Then the speaker brings examples of his starving population and forgotten veterans before his majesty's gaze. He is dumbfounded, and the princess, with an impulsive forward movement, snatches a pining baby from its mother and, holding it up in th epresence of the multitude, swears to be a mother to her people and to use her influence with her father for their good. The king is overcome to such an extent that he nods his approval and the crowd cheer him to the echo.

KINEMACOLOR

FIXING FATHER.—A funnier farce cannot be imagined. It is acted with the earnestness of a classic drama and set among some of California's most beautiful scenery.

Father refuses to allow his daughter to marry Tom. Various howlingly funny scenes occur, and father takes daughter off in his auto with bag and baggage. Tom tries to follow. Nearly exhausted he sees a motorcycle by the road, steals it and is off. He is arrested. We see him next with a gang of prisoners in convict garb working the roads. He manages to escape, hotly pursued by guards and convicts. A scarecrow standing in a field affords a refuge, and guards and men rush by. An old farmer discovers the convict and gives the alarm—it is off and away again for Tom. A box of waste paper is his next hiding place. This is placed in a cart with other trash and dumped overboard.

The next scene is funny beyond measure, as the poor fellow vainly tries to get upon the box, which is constantly turned over and over by the waves. In desperation he determines to swim for shore. Father and daughter in their launch see a man struggling in deep water and go to him. When the poor drenched Tom is nearly in the boat, father recognizes him, throws him back again, leaving him to swim for shore if he can.

Father dons a bathing suit and goes for a swim. Soaking wet, Tom arrives on the beach, sees the clothes, hangs his soaking wet prison garb on the post and goes off in father's clothes, miles too big for him. Father comes to dress, sees the wet striped garb and is compelled to use it, though it is miles too small.

Between times we see the guards and their prisoners hunting for the escaped convict. They arrive and find father, and he is forced to work on the roads with the other convicts.

But it is useless to go on. All ends happily at the police station, where Tom pays all fines with father's money and gets the girl.

A GIRL WORTH HAVING.—A Western story full of "heart" interest and excitement, but treated in a perfectly natural manner.

The girl's brother goes to the bad and steals; he escapes the men who saw him steal and runs to his sister, who hides him in an old well. The sheriff and his men come to search the house but find no one. The sheriff is in love with the girl and begs forgiveness; this she does on condition that he brings their friends and have a dance that night at her house. She hopes during the dance to let her brother make his escape. She succeeds in hiding the brother in her bedroom. When the cowboys and girls come for the dance the girl will not allow any man to dance who carries a gun. They laughingly give them up to her. There is a rival to the girl, Ruth, who loves the sheriff also, but whom the sheriff does not love. This Ruth finds out the brother is in the house and tells the sheriff, but the men have no guns and the boy escapes.

Before leaving, the boy pins a note to his sister's sunbonnet, telling her he will hide in a certain cave, and for her to bring him a horse. The next day the sister finds the note, tears it up, but one piece with the name of the cave falls and Ruth gets it and takes it to the sheriff. He, with his men, start after the boy.

The sister arrives at the cave before the sheriff; there she changes clothes with her brother, and when the sheriff and his men come up they see a girl riding down one road and a boy the other; they go after the supposed boy. Unable to make the rider halt, they shoot, only to find they have shot the girl.

In the end the girl forgives the sheriff and promises to marry him. The brother writes that he got away safely and promises to reform.

Besides this interesting story, Kinemacolor reproduces many natural beauties of the California scenery in this most attractive picture.

LUBIN

THE MISER (Feb. 8).—Paul is the only son of John Osborne, retired merchant. Osborne's life is centered in his son, his wife being dead. He desires that Paul should make a brilliant marriage, and with that object in view arranges a match with the daughter of a wealthy acquaintance. Paul, unknown to his father, has fallen in love with Alice, daughter of a foreman in one of the mills. He objects to the proposed match and tells his father that he proposes to select his own wife. The older man considers these objections as the natural obstinacy of youth, and has no fears for the ultimate success of his wishes. Matters are brought to a crisis by a rejected suitor of Alice's, who betrays the lovers to Paul's father. One day the lovers are surprised by Osborne who demands that Paul give his sweetheart up. Paul refuses to do so and, carried away with rage, the father tells Paul to choose between him and his sweetheart. Paul tries to temporize but is unheard, and finally love conquers duty. After their marriage Paul takes Alice to his father's house and pleads for a reconciliation, but his father spurns him. Paul secures a position in one of the mills and his cottage is the abode of happiness. Two children come to bless the little home. Paul has become a skilled worker and fate seems to deal kindly with the family. The elder Osborne grieves for his son. He remains shut up in the house, a broken, feeble man, with one faithful old servant and his gloomy broodings. He soon comes to be regarded as a miser by the townsmen, and the rare appearance of his tottering figure on the streets serve to strengthen the belief that Osborne has turned miser and hoards a treasure secreted in his house. Misfortune, however, comes to darken the home of Paul. A panic sweeps over the country and one by one the mills are closed and pinch and poverty make themselves felt. One of the babies fall ill and Paul tramps the streets in desperate search for work. One day when he is returning from his fruitless search he sees his father on the street and withdraws out of sight, but he hears the remarks of the bystanders and bitterly thinks how well he could use a little of his father's treasure. When he reaches home he finds the baby failing; professional nursing, change of climate and money is needed to save the little one. He thinks of his father and the gossip he has heard. He resolves to rob his father that night. He peers in through the window and sees his father in the old chair. He slips in through the window and secretes himself to await the nocturnal visit to the treasure trove which he is sure his father will pay before retiring. The old man picks up the lamp and slowly climbs to the attic. Paul follows and secretes himself while his father produces an old tin box and places it on the table. The old man is soon lost in contemplation of the contents of the box. Paul cautiously draws near but when he sees what the box contains he stands transfixed: a child's shoe, a top, marbles and many other relics of his own child and boyhood. Paul blindly starts to go but in his agitation strikes against a chair, and his father starts up in alarm. He confesses the object of his visit and the necessity which drove him to it. The pride of the old man is at last broken; he sees the unhappiness it has brought to him and his son and begs Paul's forgiveness. He entreats that he be taken to Alice that he may make his peace with her. The little cottage presents a different scene now. John Osborne, happier than he has ever been in his life, sits with the little ill grandchild on his knee.

MAJESTIC

THE EXTRA BABY (Feb. 2).—Jack and Helen are about to be married when a violent quarrel separates them and casts a shadow over both their lives. Jack goes West in despair and Helen becomes a nurse in a Children's Home. She is sent out West in charge of eleven children who expect to find real homes. But only ten of the little ones are claimed: the eleventh seems doomed to disappointment. The child takes matters into her own hands and, going out through the country, she finds Jack. She has just convinced him that he needs a little girl as Helen dashes in, looking for the lost baby. Through the influence of the winsome child, the stubborn pair are brought together and neither the extra baby nor Helen returns East again.

AN INTERRUPTED ELOPEMENT (Feb. 4).—Mabel and Tom are in love but her father objects and orders Tom from the house. When the young couple meet the old man comes out with his gun and threatens to shoot Tom if he ever sees him around again. Frightened at this, the girl removes the bullets from her father's gun. That night she plans to elope with Tom. Some painters have left a ladder against the house and Tom is to climb up at nine o'clock. A couple of tramps passing by see the ladder and decide to rob the house as things are arranged so conveniently. One of them climbs the ladder and at the top is surprised to have a suit case handed out to him. Mabel has heard the steps and, thinking it Tom, she steps out. But once on the ground she discovers her mistake and attempts to run away. The tramps, fearing they may be caught, grab the girl and start to gag her. Her father hears the disturbance and runs out, gun in hand. He tries to shoot but sees that his gun is useless; the bullets are gone. the tramps laugh and one of them jumps for the old man. Just as he is being overpowered Tom drives up in his car. With one step he is at the old man's side and has knocked the tramps senseless. After that there is no need of an elopement, for father is only too willing to bestow the blessing.

PUNCH

SOME DOCTOR (Feb. 13).—Young Doctor Green's village practice is small and he finds himself in straightened circumstances. One morning the landlord calls for his rent and states that the doctor must pay or vacate. The doctor has a fertile brain, however, and hits upon a scheme that he thinks will raise the wherewithal. He writes a note:

"I am a poor outcast, afflicted with smallpox. I die, rather than contaminate others.

"Despairingly,

"Jos. Smith."

Placing this note in the pocket of an old suit of clothes, borrowed from his gardener, he lays the clothes on the bank of the local river and awaits developments. An old fisherman discovers the clothes, alarms the neighbors, and in a twinkling half the population of the village is eagerly examining the clothes of the supposed suicide for a mark of identification. They do not find the note as it is tucked in the small watch pocket of the trousers. At this point Dr. Green appears and finds the note, which he reads. Of course all are thrown into a panic through fear of contamination and rush the doctor off to his office, where he vaccinates all hands at one dollar per vaccination. When the landlord appears again for his rent he is paid instantly and also submits to a vaccination operation at the doctor's own rate.

RELIANCE

THE STRIKE LEADER (Feb. 5).—In a large factory the boss, to cut down expenses, cuts the men's wages and a sign is posted to that effect. The men hold a mass meeting. Prominent among them is Larry—the friend of all—and a leader. They appoint a committee to wait upon Wingate, the boss. Their plea is refused. Wingate's ward, Margery, is well known among the poor neighborhoods for her kindness and charity. Joe, a burly woman, detains her one night—she tries to get away and is getting frightened when Larry happens along and comes to her assistance. He escorts her to a car. The men vote to go on strike. Larry still escorts Margery whenever he sees her in the tenement districts. Nilson, Wingate's friend, is refused by Margery. He happens to talk to Joe, who tells him of Margery's meetings with Larry. Nilson brings Joe to Wingate—and he is told what Margery has done. The two men know that a big meeting is coming off that night—Larry is a leader and if he is present it will mean—a strike. They evolve a plan. Wingate pretends to be very angry at his ward and insists upon seeing this strange man whom she has been meeting. He forces her to send a note to Larry. This note brings him to the mansion. He leaves his trusty friend, Red, outside. As soon as he steps indoors he finds himself covered by the revolvers of the two men. He sees the plot at once—and realizes they are too many for him. The girl, her eyes opened, tries to help him get away, but she is locked up in another room. Joe is sent to the meeting to tell the men that Larry has gone back on them. Red, who waits in vain, suspects foul work and jumps into a passing motor and rushes to the meeting. He arrives just as the men are ready to believe Joe and do as he says. Red shows them the note from the girl and explains why Larry is away. They all pile into the motor and hurry to Wingate's mansion. Larry has been making a terrible fight but it seems hopeless just as his pals arrive. The disturbance calls in the police. Larry tells his story, backed up by Margery. He demands the arrest of Wingate and Nilson. The girl pleads and Larry says if Wingate will raise the wages to the former scale he will withdraw. This is speedily done, to the mutual satisfaction of all.

AN AMERICAN QUEEN (Feb. 8).—Karl, Crown Prince of Dania, gives up his right to the throne that he may marry Gilda, a peasant girl. With his young wife he goes to America, leaving his father, the King, very bitter. Twenty years pass. Both Karl and his wife are dead, but their daughter Marie lives and is working for her living. She never thinks of Dania. But out in that little kingdom the heir apparent, always a weakling, dies and leaves the throne without an heir. At the King's death the throne of Dania will revert to the duke of the next principality unless some trace of Karl can be found.

The King sends ministers to America where they find Marie and acquaint her with the fact that the throne of Dania is waiting for her. She does not want to go back at first, for she loves Jim Dane, a typical American chap, and is loath to leave him. But she is finally persuaded. Off in Dania she soon wins the love of all the little country. She makes the place lively with the latest American music. But most surprising of all she soon possesses the deepest affection of the bitter old King, who dies, content his country will be in good hands.

But the arrival of Jim upsets everything.

The ministers cannot consider the match at all and inform the Queen that she must marry a man of her own rank. She refuses and clings to Jim. Angered by their refusal to accept him, she says she will return to America, and no pleading can alter her decision. But when all preparations are made, she stops to listen to the voice of the people and realizes for the first time that they are her people and they need her. So she agrees to remain and all objection to Jim is revoked. And an American Queen and an American King rule Dania to the satisfaction of all concerned.

GREAT NORTHERN

AN ORPHAN'S CONQUEST (Feb. 8).—Minna Mark, who is rather a homely looking girl, as the term goes, is a pupil at a girls' seminary and her best chum is Ann, who is an orphan. Just before the holidays Mr. and Mrs. Mark pay their daughter a visit and impart the joyous information that she is to return home for a short vacation. Minna insists that her friend must be of the holiday party and accordingly she is invited. As the days pass, it is evident that the two young women are enjoying their holiday to the fullest extent, and then arrives a note from a friend of the family announcing that his son, John Gerald, is about to pay them a long-promised visit. Mr. Mark and his wife are overjoyed, because they had long wished that John and Minna might be drawn to each other and the families be united. In order to take no chances on the future happiness of their daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Mark decide that during the stay of John Gerald, Ann, the orphan chum of their daughter, should assume the rôle of a serving maid. Mr. Gerald arrives and, notwithstanding the elaborate precautions taken he falls a victim to the charms of the pseudo servant. Seeing the trend of affairs, the parents of Minna come to the conclusion that unusual efforts must be resorted to if they are to bring about an alliance between their daughter and John.

The old gentleman engages the services of a private detective and arranges that the sleuth shall abduct Ann during the festivities in connection with a fancy dress ball which they are about to give. The plan agreed upon is that the detective is to appear as a policeman and arrest Ann on a charge of theft. On the night of the ball John and Ann saunter through the grounds and the former takes occasion to declare his love for her. He is overheard by Minna, who interrupts their tete-a-tete with the announcement that Ann is wanted in another part of the grounds. She complies with her girl friend's request and is promptly placed under arrest. Fortunately, however, John has overheard the plot and he appears on the scene just as the detective is about to lead Ann to jail. John enters unexpectedly and pulls the police disguise from the detective and announces that the orphan, Ann, is his affianced wife. The Mark family stands aghast and the detective retires in confusion. The romance is excellently presented and is another example of the Great Northern standard of superiority.

SOLAX

THE EYES OF SATAN (Feb. 2).—This is a comedy in which a conjurer, by means of mental suggestion and tricks known as sleight-of-hand and optical illusion, changes the habits and disposition of an inebriate and a grouchy old father-in-law.

Through his efforts the grouchy old man becomes a gay old blade, and the inebriate son-in-law becomes a teetotaler. This change brings satisfaction to the young man's wife and the wife of the old grouch.

The scenes are infectiously funny, and the camera tricks are remarkable, while the situations are novel in every detail.

The story starts with a big artistic insert of a neglected young wife looking at a clock at 3 a. m., and hubby still at the club. Wifey, the next morning, immediately goes home to mamma, upon whom she inflicts her tale of woe. Papa is an old grouch, and he does not encourage the protestations of his daughter. The mother, however, sympathizes with her child and plans to engage the conjurer, by whose advertisement she has been attracted. The conjurer's services are enlisted and the merry time begins. A remarkable scene takes place in the conjurer's laboratory in which a skeleton goes through many grotesque and comic stunts.

THE THIEF (Feb. 14).—Colonel Beverly Spotiswoode has fallen upon lean days. With his wife and daughter he is living in poverty in a dingy tenement and having a hard struggle to make ends meet. At the time the story opens the last cent has been expended and there is nothing in the house to eat. In addition, the daughter, Rose, has fallen ill.

When affairs are at this pass the Colonel receives a letter from an old schoolmate bidding him to a college reunion dinner at a fashionable restaurant. He is at first loath to go, but his wife and daughter prevail upon him to accept, for he will perhaps come upon something to relieve their distress among his old friends. The old evening clothes are brought out, sponged and pressed, and the Colonel sets forth.

In a restaurant he finds Alex Henderson, his old school chum, who is giving the dinner, and ten or a dozen others of the old crowd. At the dinner the Colonel, with the others, is given the opportunity to examine a remarkably fine diamond Henderson is wearing. The stud is passed about from one to the other, when suddenly the lights go out. When they come on again tbe diamond is seen to be missing. A search is made everywhere but the stone cannot be found. Henderson locks the door and telephones for the police. Two officers appear and the situation is explained to them. They suggest that a search of all present be made. All agree except the Colonel, and he is at once suspected. The party breaks up and the Colonel is shadowed home by a detective and Henderson, who climb on the fire escape to spy into the Colonel's roms. Immediately is seen the reason why the Colonel would not permit a search. From his pockets he brings forth portions of food he has concealed there and brought home to his starving family. Henderson sends the detective away and, descending the fire escape, knocks at the door. The Colonel is at first cold, but as Henderson explains that he has come to apologize, he is admitted, and as he walks across the floor the daughter catches a glimpse of something sparkling in his heel. The diamond stud is found imbedded in the rubber heel of Henderson's shoe, and Henderson thereupon presents it to Rose.

"101" BISON

ON THE FRONTIER (Two Reel) (Feb. 11).—Three settlers, Standish, Farley and a companion, are hunting. They shoot at a bird in the trees. Two Indians shoot their arrows from behind trees at the same bird. They meet. The bird shows a bullet mark and an arrow in its body. There is an argument. Standish counsels giving the bird to the Indians, but Farley knocks one of them down and the red men go away threatening revenge. They take the news to their chief, and the simple incident creates death and bloodshed. Farley is enamoured of Virginia, the pretty daughter of Standish. She does not encourage him. At her father's request she joins Farley in a ride and comes across the old squaw, Waving Grass, who is squatted on the ground waiting for death to come and relieve her sufferings. Poor Waving Grass has been supplanted by a young squaw who can carry fagots and prove of more service. Waving Grass is given some water and food and sent out of camp amidst the jeers of the squaws and the braves. Farley dismounts and, announcing that it is "only a squaw," gets on his horse again, to the indignation of Virginia, who helps the poor soul on her own horse and takes her to their home, followed by the sulky Farley. Refreshed and strengthened, the old squaw vows her fealty to the Standishes and tells them that the Indians are on the warpath and to prepare for defence. Standish takes Farley away with him to the settlement, where it is decided to send a request for a new fort. A messenger takes the request, which is granted. Captain Brand is entrusted with the work and sets forth to the settlement with troopers and materials. The settlers are warned and flock to the trading post, where they pile up the furniture and boxes as a barricade in the narrow street. The Indians attack and massacre is averted by the arrival of the troops. The building of the new fort is started and the wagons, manned by settlers and troopers, start to get logs. Farley, seeing a growing attachment between Captain Brand and Virginia, tries to back out of going, but is made to do so by Standish and Brand and he secretly meditates revenge for the slights. He escapes and joins the Indian chief, Black Hawk, who is returning from a visit to Captain Brand, whom he has warned to go and leave the Indian lands alone. Farley suggests that the Indians can prevent the building of the new fort by exterminating the men and wagons comprising the lumber camp. They attack and the troopers and settlers put up a magnificent fight against odds. They bore holes in the sides of the wagons and lie flat and reserve their fire until the Indians are right on them. The Indians, twice repulsed, discard their horses and creep up on foot and a terrific hand-to-hand encounter takes place, the defenders using their augers, hatchets and the butt ends of their guns. Waving Grass, uneasy in her mind, has ridden out and has seen the start of the fight and has spurred back and secured the remaining settlers and troopers, who arrive in time to rout the Indians. Farley is killed by Captain Brand as he is about to strike Standish down, the latter being in a death struggle with Black Hawk. Waving Grass sees the dead chief and the old loyalty returns. She requests his body for her services. The dead chief is removed and Waving Grass, refusing assistance, sits by the side of her old leader to welcome her own passing.

BINKS DID IT (Feb. 10).—An Italian family, in an apartment house, are having a regular breakdown dance, which causes the plaster on the ceiling below to fall in the dining-room of the Irish family living there. They are just eating their supper when a large piece of plaster falls into the boob son's plate of soup. They all jump up and holler to the Italians above to quit dancing, but they only increase their dancing, causing much more plaster to fall. The Irish family get frightened, grab chairs, mortar hods, etc., to hold up the ceiling, sending the boob son to the lumber yard to get a plank to be used as a prop to hold up the ceiling. The Italians continue dancing more than ever. The boob son, having taken with him his two pet bull dogs, arrives at the lumber yard, secures a plank and, on coming out, knocks over an old washerwoman, causing the dogs to run away, dragging him and plank after them. They get all tangled up spinning him around like a top, then dash off with him into a strange house, up through the dining-room, where the family are just having supper, and up over the table, which crashes, upsetting everything. The boob is dragged out by the dogs, followed by the crowd and a shower of plates. Meanwhile, the Italians are still dancing their heads off, the floor sagging and swaying, the Irish family by this time almost exhausted in trying to hold up the ceiling, plaster, etc., all over the place. The dogs still run away with the boob and his plank. They come down the street, followed by the crowd. The dogs drag the boob into another house, upstairs to the next floor. As the crowd arrive at the foot of the stairs they are met by ashower of furniture, etc. The dogs have dragged the boob into an old maid's bedroom, who musses him up and throws him out, and just as the crowd at the foot of the stairs are recovering from the shower of furniture, the boob, plank and dogs come flying down on them. The dogs dash out of the house and run away. The boob comes dashing out, still holding his plank and beats it off for home. The Italians have danced until one of their number has fallen through up to his arms. The Irish below try to pull him through. Finding it impossible they sbove him back up. Just then the boob son arrives with the plank. He puts it up. All the Irish say "Thank God," take down the chairs, hods, etc., they have been holding up the ceiling with, and think all O. K. but alas!—the poor nut of a boob bought a plank eighteen inches wide but only five inches tbick, and it begins to bend, then breaks, and all the Italians, plaster, etc., come breaking through the ceiling. The boob son dives under the table, the Irish grab all the Italians and throw them out.

THE DUELLISTS (Feb. 14).—Flo and Tilly, two sisters, have sweethearts. Flo's beau, Bob, was a manly young fellow who was desperately in love with her, while Flo liked to assume a cool attitude and tease him.

Tilly's beau was a minister, and quiet.

Bob called to see Flo, who decided to tease him. He soon became angry and left the house. Going out he bumped against a young man coming in and, not knowing who he was, quickly made up his mind that this was the cause of Flo's indifference to him. Flo came out of the door and, seeing the matter as Bob saw it, carried it still further by welcoming the minister into the house.

Tilly was reading a novel not approved of by the minister. This led to a little "tiff" and the young minister soon left the house, much dejected in spirit. Tilly decided to write and tell him that she was in the wrong. Flo wrote an amazing letter of love and devotion. Soon a knock was heard at the door and the girls hearing it ran from the room to arrange their toilet. Bob, who had done the knocking, not receiving a reply, walked into the room to wait for Flo to appear. Not having anything to occupy his mind he glanced around the room for a paper or book, when his eyes beheld the letter. A love letter to the minister in Flo's handwriting! Mad with jealousy and broken-hearted, he went out. He met an old friend from Paris—a French Count—whom he invited to call upon him. When he reached home he decided to end his life and, taking the gas tube, he lay down to await death. But the odor of gas was unpleasant and he thought jumping out the window would be easier. He was on the point of doing so when in walked the Count. Upon finding out the cause of Bob's troubles, he immediately assured him that he would fight the minister a duel. Summoning his valet he went to the house of the minister and served the challenge. When they returned to Bob, he was hiding. His knees quaked as the Count ordered him to the battlefield. Here the men met for the second time. Both scared to death—they decided they did not want to fight and were on the point of shaking hands when they beheld Flo and Tilly running across the field. They immediately began to "fight" and the girls, seeing their lovers battling with possible death, gave wild screams of protest—which were so maddening and threatening that the Count and his valet took to their heels, and Flo and Tilly each saved their sweethearts from what might have ended disastrously.

BILLY FOOLS DAD (Feb. 11).—Billy is in love with Lottie, who is the daughter of old man Smith, who does not approve of Billy as a suitor because he wants her to marry Percy Meldon, the dude of the village. When the story opens Billy is discovered sitting on the porch spooning with Lottie. The old man misses her and, looking through the window, spies her and Billy in an embrace. He becomes enraged because he has told Billy repeatedly that he did not want him to visit his daughter, so he picks up pillows, books and various other articles and proceeds to the porch where he impresses it upon Billy in a very forcible way that he don't want him to call again by forcibly taking his daughter away and hitting Billy with pillows, books, etc., which considerably shatters his features but does not dampen the ardor of his love. When he learns that the family are going to a theatre that afternoon, he decides to call on his sweetheart again, which he does. The door is locked but he climbs through the window, but unfortunately for him the old man forgot his theatre tickets and returns to find Billy hid under the table. In trying to pull him from under the table he unconsciously pulls his trousers off and kicks Bill out of the house without them. Bill is now at his wits' end what to do, as he is informed that the father is going to place the girl in a convent that afternoon, so he arranges with several friends to meet the old man in his automobile on the way to the convent, and pretend to hold him up and rob him, when at the opportune moment Bill will rush upon the scene and defend the old man, which plan is successfully carried out, and he succeeds in fooling dad and gaining his consent to marry his affinity.

STRICTLY BUSINESS (Feb. 16).—Chester Barnett is in love with Pearl White. Pearl's father will not consent to their marriage unless Chester can show that he has $5,000 in the bank. Pearl's father gives her $200 as a birthday present. She gets an idea from a book she reads and she and Chester hatch a scheme. Pearl gives Chester the $200 and he buys some land from her father for that amount. She then has a friend of hers write a letter to Barnet on the letterhead of a pottery concern offering to buy all the clay he can sell. Mr. White sees Chester carting away some clay from this lot and cannot understand it until Chester calls at his office and purposely drops this decoy letter. Father then entreats Chester to sell the land back to him, which Chester finally does for $5,200. Father immediately writes a letter to the pottery company offering to sell them clay, and is dismayed when they reply that they have all they need. He goes home and to his surprise finds Chester and Pearl in each other's arms. He protests until Chester shows him his bankbook with the $5,200 deposit, and father, remembering his promise, gives his consent to the marriage of the clever pair.

On the same reel:

AN AWFUL SCARE.—Holtz, Schultz and Schmaltz are three friends. They attend a meeting of spiritualists and discuss things pertaining to the other world. They separate to go home. Holtz upon his arrival is shocked to find upon his opening his door a large black coffin. Frightened out of his wits he runs from the house. He meets Schultz and Schultz, doubting his story, accompanies him home. He sees the same sight and they both run away. They then go to Schultz's home and the same thing awaits them there. They run again and, meeting Schmaltz, tell him of their strange experiences. He accuses them of having the meeting they attended on their minds, but agrees to go with them to Schultz's room. He goes and he also sees this gruesome object. He takes them to his room and there also is a strange black coffin. They run out and get a policeman. All four come back and after much hesitation on the part of all, the officer goes to the coffin to see what it contains. He finds a letter from a friend of Schmaltz's, who is an undertaker, explaining that as he is retiring from business he is presenting his friends with a coffin, in the belief that they will need it some day.

BILLY'S DOUBLE CAPTURE (Feb. 16).—Billy Jones, a detective, connected with the Winkerton Detective Agency, gets a notification from his chief to get on the trail of Jimsey Wharton, a social highwayman. Wharton is suspected of having committed several robberies in Chicago, but the police so far have been unable to catch him with the goods. Billy locates Wharton and learns that he has become acquainted with Charles Batwell, a millionaire. Suspecting Wharton's real motive in associating with Batwell, Billy gets a friend to introduce him to the Batwell family. Billy watches Wharton closely; he learns that Wharton is a frequent visitor at the Batwell home, and also is carrying on a dangerous flirtation with Mrs. Batwell.

Billy meets Lois Batwell, and falls in love with her. She returns his love. This gives Billy an opportunity to watch Wharton closely without arousing suspicion. He finds a wallet which Wharton lost and discovers that he has purchased a ticket to Montreal. Billy draws the conclusion that Wharton intends to get the Batwell jewels and leave town. Billy returns the wallet to Wharton and immediately lays plans to effect his capture. Believing that the evening of the reception held at the Batwell home is the time that Wharton has selected to get possession of the Batwell jewels, Billy, with two other detectives, goes to the Batwell home. While he is trailing Wharton Billy does not neglect his love affair with Lois. Mrs. Batwell realizing that Wharton is persistent in his love-making, warns him that he has gone far enough. Wharton assumes the attitude that he is hurt by Mrs. Batwell refusing his proffered love and leaves the house, but returns and enters the house secretly. He is seen by Billy, who has watched his every move.

Wharton is surprised in the act of robbing by Mrs. Batwell. To cover his real motive for entering the house, he makes violent love to Mrs. Batwell, which she resents. The woman, terrified at the man's intrusion, begs him to go. Wharton has taken the precaution to lock the door, which was fortunate for him, as Mr. Batwell comes to the room at this particular moment; he is surprised to find the door locked. Mrs. Batwell prevails upon Wharton to leave, which in reality he is only too glad to do, as he has her jewels in his possession. He leaves the room by the window, but is captured by Billy and the detectives as soon as he leaves the room. The wife admits her husband, and is unable to meet his questioning.

Billy brings Wharton back to the room, where he is searched, and the jewels found in his possession. The Batwells realize that they have been harboring a thief. They thank Billy for saving their jewels. Wharton is taken away, and Billy, satisfied with his capture of the social highwayman, seeks to make another capture. In this he is successful also. The siege he has laid on Lois' heart has resulted in her complete surrender.

THE RANCH GIRL'S MEASUREMENTS (Feb. 12).—In the southern part of New Mexico there lived a young ranch girl, Nell Rawling, the daughter of a fairly well-to-do widow, who owns a large ranch in that vicinity. Nell had been educated at an Eastern college, and when she returned to the ranch, all of the cowboys, including Joe Willis, the foreman of the ranch, and Tony Mendoza, an unscrupulous, half-breed Mexican, were so struck with her beauty and light-heartedness that each one of them decided to win her for their very own. While at school Nell had been in the habit of getting a new dress every so often. When she returned to the ranch her mother did not see any need to buy her clothes so promiscuously.

One bright morning Nell receives a catalog from a mail order house in the East. She becomes fascinated with the many different gowns displayed therein. She takes her catalog and retires to the back porch of the ranch house, and there she dreams of the many nice dresses she might buy if her mother was willing. While there, the cowboys, who have come in off the range, see her seated, and, thinking it is his chance to propose to Nell, Dick Craig, a tenderfoot and cowboy, interrupts her dream of dresses and pops the question to her. This proposal hands Nell the laugh, and she tells Dick to be on his way, that there is no chance. Dick returns to his cowboy friends with his head bowed down with sorrow, when Slim, a tall, lean and lanky cowboy, decides to try his luck. He is received in the same manner as his predecessor, only handled a little rougher by Nell. He also returns to his horse and to consultation. One, Shorty, the runt of the cow camp, notices Nell feeding the chickens, he braces up with that "she can't resist me" air, and he proceeds to where Nell is. Nell, in a light-hearted way, while Shorty is proposing, slips an egg of doubtful age into his pocket, and Shorty, in his earnestness in telling Nell how she could not live without him, smashes the egg in his pocket. Nell breaks out into a boisterous laugh, and Shorty, seeing that there is no use, goes away in disgust, not only from losing Nell, but from the fact that the egg of doubtful age was broken in his pocket.

Nell becomes tired of so many proposals, and decides to go for a ride. She sends Tony to saddle her pony. Just as she is about to mount for her ride, Tony insists that she listen to his tale of love, but Nell, being a spirited college girl, lands a blow on Tony's head, and Tony decides he had better keep his mouth shut. After enjoying her ride in the beautiful vicinity of her mother's ranch, Nell returns home and there she finds Joe Willis, the foreman of the ranch, and the only man she would accept if he would only propose; but Joe is of a very bashful turn of mind and, although Nell gives him every possible chance to crack the question, Joe is afraid to take the chance. Disgusted with the man's actions, Nell decides to try a scheme, and so places an order on the order board at the back of the ranch, stating that she will marry the first man who will deliver or cause to be delivered, the exact number of yards for a dress for her, at $1 a yard. The cowboys notice her tacking this sign on the board and run to read what it says. When they note contents, they make a wild rush for their bronchos and start into town.

But before doing this they measure every imaginable object on the ranch, from the cow to old Aunty, the chore woman. Now, Fatty, a good, big, fat, good-natured slob, when he reads the sign, decides in his sleepy brain that it would be a good chance to buy Kate, the younger sister of Nell, who has not had the same advantages, a dress. So, Fatty starts into town to purchase goods for a dress for her. There is a wild race to the village store, which is led by Tony, the Mexican. The village storekeeper, who has deplored the fact that business is so bad, decides to cut down the price of his cloth from $2.98 to $1.00. Just at that moment, the cowboys of the Widow Rawling's ranch, rush in town and they practically buy him out wholesale. Fatty is among them, and is laughing at the fact that there is such a rush, when he is in no hurry because he knows that he is the only one after the other sister.

Tony Mendoza, knowing that the hardest man he has to beat in this race for a wife is Joe Willis, decides to use trickery to beat him, and he places a nail in the hoof of Joe's horse, which causes him to go lame on the way back to the ranch. Joe, seeing this, has a quick, bright idea to send his goods home to Nell by his faithful old dog, Jose. He straps nine yards, that is his purchase, to Jose's back and starts him for the ranch. Jose takes a short cut over the prairie, and gets there first with Joe Willis' goods. Just as Nell is marking this nine yards as the first delivered, Tony, the Mexican, rushes in with the exact amount of nine yards, but he doesn't win the hand of Nell because Joe's dog got there first. At that moment Joe comes upon the scene, and seeing his name on the board as winner, he forgets his bashfulness and takes Nell into his arms to the discomfiture of Tony and the other rejected suitors, with the exception of Fatty, who has delivered his goods to his sweetheart Kate, and they are all wrapped up in each other and in the goods, too.

CURING A TEMPER (Feb. 5).—Gilbert Parker is furious; he has invited his wife to the theatre, but she delays interminably at the dressmaker's. Finally she appears in her new garment, but a quarrel ensues, ending in his departure, leaving his wife in tears.

Soon afterward she is disturbed in her misery by a visit from her old friend, Harold Moore, the artist. After hearing the story, he conceives a plan to teach the husband a lesson. Under his dictation she writes a letter stating that his temper in unendurable and that she has gone away with Harold Moore. They then proceed to the studio, where they dress a wax model in the new dress, which has caused all the trouble, and seat the figure at the dinner table.

When, later, Gilbert enters the studio, he sees what appears to be his wife, in the artist's embrace, and discharges his revolver at her. Then, horrified at what he has done, he sinks upon the sofa. After permitting him to believe the worst for a few moments, the artist beckons to the wife, who quickly enters the room and is soon in her husband's arms. Gilbert is much relieved to know that it was all a joke, and promises to control himself in the future.

A DEAL IN STOCKS (Feb. 8).—Accidents will happen. While riding her bicycle one day, pretty Janet Waters runs into a young man, causing him to fall and severely injure his arm. At her home she nurses his wounds so tenderly that he soon loses all sense of pain, but meanwhile becomes fascinated with his nurse and gladly accepts an invitation to extend his visit. Friendship ripens into love, and before long he has wooed and won her.

One day, however, he learns that his fiancee is very rich, and regretfully explains to his sweetheart and her father that his principles will not permit him to marry a girl who is better off in this world's goods than he. The disappointed girl appeals to her father, who devises a scheme whereby the obstacle may be overcome.

Secret instructions are given to his brokers, who manipulate the stock market so that before long the young fellow is surprised to learn that he is rich.

With a light heart, he hastens to inform Janet, and arrangements for the marriage are soon completed. It is not until the happy couple are seated in their automobile, ready to start upon their honeymoon, that he learns the real cause of his sudden rise to wealth.

LUX

TICKETS, PLEASE (Feb. 7).—Pat is collecting tickets on the Creepy Crawley Express. He succumbs to the charms of a fair young thing, who sets his heart thumping so loudly that it can be heard above the roar and rattle of the locomotive. He tries all the artful little blandishments he knows of, but the fair creature regards him with a sphinx-like gaze. There is also another admirer of the lady on the train, and he promptly casts Pat out of the carriage window for presuming to rival him.

Under these trying circumstances Pat's stout heart fails him not, and he makes his way to the baggage wagon, where he hides himself in the lady's dress basket. Upon arriving at her destination, the fair one has the basket taken to her hotel, and Pat soon finds himself hidden in his beloved's bedroom. He has a cautious peep around and discovers that his rival has also surreptitiously entered the apartment. Pat cannot restrain his indignation, and thus betrays his presence to his rival, who promptly draws a revolver and opens fire upon him. A deadly duel follows, and the two bloodthirsty villains entirely wreck the bedroom. The noise caused by their violent efforts to wreak their vengeance, attracts the other guests, who, with the able assistance of the hotel staff, proceed to give them a lesson in the conduct of their future love affairs.

THE GUILTY HAND (Feb. 9).—Bravo! Bravo! Wonderful indeed!

As the last strains of the beautiful tenor solo from Rigoletto were drowned in a round of the heartiest applause, so was the very popular singer, Barusco, almost hidden by the rush of admirers who crowded about him. The Baroness d'Esmont, at whose home the grand opera star was singing, seemed especially impressed and a moment later the singer and his hostess strolled out into the garden.

But as they walked in the beautiful grounds there, in the shadows following them was the figure of a man. And it was—Viscount de la Mure—who had been invited by the baroness herself.

The night was beautiful—the air was balmy and sensuous. Lulled by poetic dreams, the baroness, who remained on a bench in the grounds when Barusco returned to the house, was soon fast asleep.

Suddenly—out of the darkness comes a human form with a black hood concealing the features. Who is this person?

The unfortunate woman, attacked by this villainous, masked person, fights back and finally, after a terrific struggle, manages to escape.

Meanwhile, in the drawing-room, Baron d'Esmont and some of his guests are playing cards when they are greatly startled by the arrival of a telegram which declares that the man calling himself Barusco, the tenor, is none other than a dangerous bandit. Immediately there is a great commotion.

A party of ladies, strolling in the garden, find the baroness apparently asleep on the bench, but when she fails to waken when approached, they discover her condition and she is carried to the house.

Barusco is accused and the police are called, but the baroness awakens and takes the tenor by the hands. Slowly she drops them and tells the officers to release the singer—"He is not guilty."

Looking about the baroness notes that the viscount nervously conceals one hand, and, walking slowly to him, she demands, "Give me your hands." He offers one but she demands both, and as she grips the right hand firmly, the viscount winces with pain. "Here is the guilty one!" she cries.

In the struggle, the baroness had bitten the hand of her assailant severely, which had caused him to give up the attack.

VITAGRAPH

STENOGRAPHER TROUBLES (Feb. 6).—When hearts are young and fancies free, hearts will go out to hearts. The Boss, who is more or less of a grouch, cannot see it and very much objects when he detects his pretty stenographer flirting with his young clerks. His protests are of no avail; whenever his back is turned, the boys are making "goo-goo" eyes at the stenographer or sharing bonbons with her. He comes to the conclusion that he will engage a woman of maturer years, who has forgotten that she was ever young. He advertises for such a one and he has many applicants. All kinds and ages. Whenever a good-looking one appears, the boys give a sly wink or find something to do which will enable them to have a better look at her. Finally, he selects a scrawny old maid, to whom he gives the job. The next morning she is ready for service, and while he is dictating to her, she looks sweetly into his face, removes stray ravellings from his coat and occasionally gives him a flirtatious tap and beams lovingly into his face. He is distressed and irritated, but she still goes on as cheerfully as before.

The boys enjoy his discomfiture, and have hard work suppressing their laughter. The next day she brings a box of candies which she eats while he is dictating. When he shows his displeasure, she very coyly tries to place a candy in his mouth. During this session, the Boss's wife comes into the office, and, seeing the antique typist's familiarity, makes her presence known by giving the giddy old flirt a piece of her mind, and discharging her upon the spot. She is now keyed up to the proper point of attack upon her husband; seizing him by the ear, she marches him out of the office with her, leaving the clerks full scope to give vent to their glee in laughter unconfined.

NESTOR

THE LITTLE PEACEMAKER (Feb. 12).—John Taylor and Henry Martin had been lifelong friends. Their son and daughter are engaged to be married, but the old men quarrel over the water rights and forbid the marriage. However, Mrs. Martin helps the young people to elope and they start housekeeping for themselves. But even after the birth of a little son, whom they have named John Henry, the fathers remain obstinate and refuse to see them. The young father and mother have been planning how they can bring the former old friends together, so the son writes to John Taylor telling him that his wife has deserted him, and asking grandfather John to come for baby John, and the daughter writes to her parents telling them her husband has deserted her and asking them to come for baby Henry. Both parties arrive at the same time, and ere they leave the wonderful baby has succeeded in so far softening their hearts that a reconciliation is easily effected.

NOTES

Jack Richardson, of the "Flying A," who always plays the villain has received a left-handed compliment from a mother. In the letter, the mother states that she is certain that Jack Kerrigan is a splendid young man because he plays his parts so nicely. But she is certain that Richardson is as black at heart as he appears on the screen. She has permitted her daughters to have a photograph of Kerrigan about the house, but that of Richardson has been tabooed. Richardson said yesterday he was going to be more villainous than ever in the future.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT FILM MERITS

Edison

"False to Their Trust," one of the "What Happened to Mary" series, is another story of misappropriated bank funds. It contains a good deal of interest. The discovery of the secret by the aid of the dictaphone gives the story a decidedly up-to-date tone.

Lubin

"The Old Oaken Bucket" is picturesque in effect, as well as being strongly tragic. The story of the boy who left the farm for a position in the city, taking up in due time with bad companions, and the natural sequence, illuminated by a murder, is well worked out.

"The Insurance Agent" is a specially good comedy, in which Lottie Briscoe and Arthur Johnson are at their best. This film is specially to be recommended.

Kalem

"The 'Possum Hunt" is very good—has some comedy, plenty of atmosphere and is more or less educational in type.

Biograph

"The Tender-Hearted Boy" has something of originality in its makeup. It is a question whether the tender-heartedness of the boy should be so closely linked with cowardice as depicted in the picture. However, this is a matter of opinion.

"The High Cost of Reduction" has some merit as a comedy and will doubtless bring a laugh in every instance.

"The Misappropriated Turkey" is far-fetched in plot, and in the general working out of the story. The secreting of a bomb in the carcass of a turkey, to be sent to the owner of the foundry, might be incentive to vice.

Vitagraph

"When Bobby Forgot" is an excellent comedy, with Kenneth Casey and Adele de Garde in the leading roles. The youngsters display exceeding cleverness and aptitude in this film.

Nestor

"Fatty and the Bandits" is a laugh from first to last. There are no objectionable points in the production—nothing to offend the guardians of morals—and it contains some excellent comedy situations.

"The Strike Breaker" is founded on an interesting theme, but has a number of inconsistencies which mar to a great extent the effect of the picture.

Frontier

"The Branded Six-Shooter" is more or less of a thrilling nature and is excellent for theatre audiences. There is, however, a deal of melodrama in its makeup.

Powers

"The Mutual Friend" is much too melodramatic. The theme, which is grounded on unhappy matrimonial conditions and consequent murder and suicide, has no particular use and its morbidness condemns it.

Crystal

"Accident Insurance" merits praise for its comedy element, which is exceptionally strong.

"Her Lady Friend," on the same reel, has not the merits of the former, but is at the same time quite commendable.

Kinemacolor

"The Struggle" is one of the first of the Kinemacolor dramas to really make itself felt. It depicts very vividly the struggle of a young man between two powerful influences—the terrible morphine habit and love. This picture is very well produced and is a credit to the Kinemacolor Company.

"The Violin" is also excellent, as is also "Mystic" manipulations, which demonstrate some clever sleight-of-hand feats.

GAUMONT NOTES

Claude Patin, assistant manager of the Paris Gaumont office has been detailed to the Flushing office of the Gaumont Co. to take charge of foreign affairs.

* * * *

J. Roy Hunt, who has just circled the globe for the Gaumont Weekly, landed in San Francisco February 1, and is now in New York. He obtained more than forty thousand feet of negative.

* * * *

Raymond Gaumont is at the Pacific Carnival in Honolulu. After a month's stay in the Hawaiian Islands he will sail for Central America, where he will follow the United Fruit Company's railroad lines through the Latin republics, completing his tropical work at Panama. He will then come north and cover Northwestern Canada.

* * * *

Operator Nusbaum, of the Gaumont Co., left January 20th for Yucatan, where he will spend three months, covering Southern Mexico and British Honduras.

HOCHSTETTER-PIERSON COMPANY

For the benefit of readers and those contemplating business dealings with the Hochstetter Utility Company, we have been asked to announce the recent change of name of the company to that of the Hochstetter-Pierson Company. This concern has now under way some very important film productions which will in the near future be made known to the public.

The Columbia Film Company, recently incorporated with a capital of $100,000, will have its headquarters at 1435 Tremont street, Denver, Colo. This concern will turn out three releases weekly. In this work three companies of fifty people each will be employed. The incorporators are Lester Park, E. B. Deu Pree and Otis B. Thayer. These men, with Byron Park and William E. Foley, will be the board of directors. Foley will be vice-president and Thayer managing director. The latter was formerly with the Selig people, and is thoroughly familiar with the moving picture business.

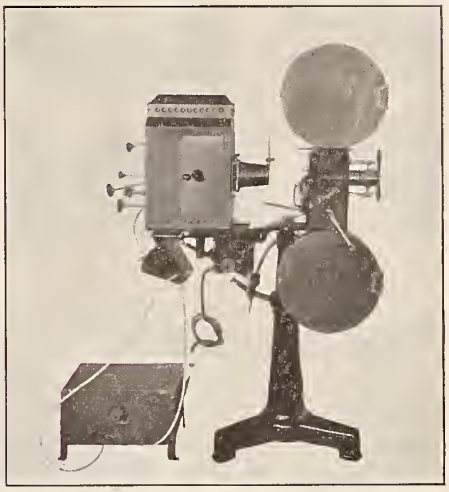
ACCURACY

WHAT IS IT WORTH TO YOU?

How many times have you ordered repair parts for that other machine and when they arrived they didn't fit? How many hours have you wasted trying to make them fit, and even then you knew you hadn't done as good a job as you required, but you had cussed and fussed and then let it go at that.

Many, many times we have heard operators say, "Why don't the manufacturers make parts that fit?"

So we made up our minds that we would make all parts of our machine absolutely accurate no matter how much it cost, and it does cost like sin, but it is going to pay us and pay you, Mr. Exhibitor, and Mr. Operator. With that in mind we named the company The Precision Co., and we have lived up to that name in the full sense of the word.



Simplex

projectors are made of the best materials possible to find for the purpose and that fact combined with their accuracy insures such long wear that those who are used to other makes of machines are astonished at the condition of Simplexes that have seen hard service for sixteen or eighteen months.

When the time comes, however, that new parts have to be used you can depend upon it that they will fit. They will go on like an old glove, not too loose or too tight, but just comfortable, for they are accurate.

A machine made that way cannot help but be better than that other kind.

Our name is your guarantee.

A SMALL BOY AND A LARGE PANIC

ALL the papers throughout the country supplied with news by the Associated Press have, more or less, scare headlines regarding the tragedy at the Hippodrome in Houston street, New York, on Sunday evening, February 2d. Of course it is impossible for any of us in the industry to suppress such facts or prevent the newspapers making capital out of such an event. At the same time I do think the truth should be told in the first instance, so that in future references to the event people are not scared.

A movement is on foot to prevent the use of motor drives on the machine. Some contend that the motor drive in this instance made the operator careless, and two or three feet of the film were outside the machine, and the direct rays from the carbons caused the fire. It behooves the manufacturers of machines to watch the result of this event very thoroughly. I contend the fact that accidents and fires are so few from this cause that improvements to machines should not be suppressed without a thorough trial. Some claim that a motor drive makes the operator careless and indifferent, it makes him lazy and inattentive. The motor drive certainly gives a steadiness to the picture that the hand-driven machine cannot accomplish, but, apart from all this, it was not the fire that caused the panic; it was a small boy in the booth yelling "Fire!" and the excitability of the various nationalities assembled in Houston street did the rest.

I have advocated in these columns many times that exhibitors flash upon the screen a slide stating that the machine and booth are fireproof. I have also recommended that a fire drill be taken every now and again, the same as is accomplished in schools. I have also suggested the education of the audiences regarding their duty in the event of a fire, and it is gratifying to know that a few exhibitors have carried out these suggestions. Why not all?

The New York papers have been full of suggestions of drastic measures to be made for like contingencies at the expense of the exhibitor, who surely has enough to contend with, without further legislation. If it were possible to eliminate the small boy from the booth as assistants to operators it would be well, and a different story would be told. In the inquiries that have been made Fire Commissioner Johnson and Assistant District-Attorney Minton state that the loss of life and the panic were unavoidable, and remarked that such panics are just as likely to occur in any of the 800 houses in New York under the same conditions. Evidence was brought out that the proprietor had been fined five or six times for violation of the license on account of overcrowding, and a fine of $57.50 had been imposed in each case. Why were they allowed to hold a license and continue in business? If such a measure as Alderman Folks' bill had passed, such a calamity would never have occurred.

> Alderman Ralph Folks, father of the proposed ordinance to keep motion picture theatres on the "street level," scored Canon Chase, saying that he and others were indirectly responsible for the loss of life in the Houston street accident because they had insisted on lugging in a "censorship" amendment to his "street level" bill.
> "Religious fanaticism, such as burned men at the stake in the fifteenth century, should not be tolerated to burn people in moving picture shows today," says Alderman Folks.

While these words seem very strong, they are, to some extent, deserved, and at the Board of Aldermen meeting on the 4th, wherein the Mayor had written a letter asking that an immediate consideration be given to the passing of the ordinance introduced by Alderman Folks, the following interesting debate took place:

> Not content with thus delaying action, the Tammany men passed a resolution calling for a public hearing on not only the Folks ordinance, but also the Morrison ordinance, which contains the censorship provision. It was introduced by Alderman John J. White, who frankly acknowledges that he is interested in the theatrical business. The hearing is set for Saturday, July 15th.
> Alderman White opposes the resolution because it provides for moving picture show licenses for theatres seating a maximum of six hundred persons, instead of only three hundred, as now. He attacked Alderman Folks as being a representative of the "film trust." He explained that Mr Folks was a member of the National Board of Censorship, and that it had been charged that this body had received $8,000 or $9,000 from the "film trust" to carry on its work.

Alderman Folks indignantly denied that he had ever represented the "film trust" or had ever received a dollar from it or held a dollar of stock in any theatrical enterprise. "But as for Alderman White," he added, "he admits his personal interest in theatres and asks that it be protected by us. It ought to be enough to disqualify him from voting on the subject. Those opposed to my ordinance are willing to sacrifice lives to keep up their profits."

Replying to the remarks made by Alderman Folks in regard to the moving picture ordinance, Canon Chase said:

"I cannot believe that Mr. Folks is quoted correctly when he is reported to have said that Canon Chase and such men were indirectly responsible for the loss of life on Sunday night. Mr. Folks knows that the Folks ordinance does not require any improvement against the danger of fire as to exits, galleries, stairs or fire escapes in the existing motion picture shows. He knows that the Morrison ordinance, which he has opposed and I favored, required the existing shows, after proper time, to conform to the standards which the Folks ordinance required only of motion picture houses which may be built in the future."

Of course I am not interested in the quarrels among the politicians. I fully believe the Cinematograph industry is far above politics, and has grown to such enormous proportions that it ought to be governed by men from its own ranks, who would put it on a basis where politics cannot enter in and to uphold the dignity of the industry so that legislation, such as is proposed by Canon Chase, and which I produce on another page, is not needed. Again, Thomas J. Ahearn, State Fire Marshal, in his annual report, says:

"The 15,000,000 people throughout the country who daily attend moving picture exhibitions are exposed to danger from fires and unbridled displays."

For the further protection of the crowds attending moving picture theatres Fire Marshal Ahearn would prescribe a set of rules to govern the erection of such theatres, and would "demand that the proprietor should be compelled to take out a license for the place, not its manager, so that the laws could not be evaded by a mere transfer from name to name."

"There should be direct lighting for moral safety," he continues, and he also recommends ordinances to govern the storage and handling of films. "It has been shown that moving pictures have frequently been the occasion of pyromania," the fire marshal declares, citing a number of instances where "pyromaniacs were started on their career by moving pictures." To remedy this and other conditions he favors a censorship of films.

Fire Marshal Ahearn is very much behind the times in recommending the censorship of films and the storage of the same as he does. The Board of Fire Underwriters and others have made it pretty hard for the exchange men to store films and also for the transportation of the same. I quite believe that good protection should be given, and that every possible safeguard should be put around the film in transit and also in use in the booth, and that well-trained operators should handle the same, not leaving such duties to boys thirteen or fourteen years of age, who not only rewind the film, but run the machine while the operator gets a smoke on the balcony. I have written Mr. Ahearn for statistics of the "pyromaniacs" of which he speaks, and also for a percentage of the fires in the State of New York, due to Cinematograph fires. I am fully of the opinion that the statements I published two years ago, and which have been quoted in every Cinematograph fire inquiry since then, wherein I made the statement from actual figures, that not 2 per cent. of the fires throughout the country were caused by the films, and since then I have carefully watched every fire that occurred, and I do not think that I am wrong in making the statement that not 1 per cent. of the fires during the last two years can be traced to the Cinematograph industry. If, and this is a very large IF, the small boy could only be educated through the schools on the moving picture houses, not to cry "Fire!" and IF some of the grown-up boys would only keep their heads cool in an emergency, panics would be avoided.

It is for the heads of all the companies, irrespective of their standing, whether licensed or unlicensed, to get together and take counsel, drop for the time being their animosities one to the other, and form a council for the betterment and full protection of the industry. The well-known truism, "United we stand, divided we fall," is never more exemplified than it is to-day in the Cinematograph world.

AN ACT

To Amend the Penal Law in Relation to an Official Inspecspection of Motion Picture Films.

The People of the State of New York, represented in Senate and Assembly, do enact as follows:

Section 1, Article 106, of the Penal Law is hereby amended by inserting after section 1140a a new section to be known as Section 1140b, to read as follows:

1140b. Official Inspection of Motion Picture Films.

1. It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to show or exhibit any motion picture in any licensed place of public amusement, in any theatre, concert hall, motion picture theatre or in any open air motion picture theatre without first having obtained a permit therefcre issued by the State Department of Education as hereinafter provided. Every day's exhibition in any licensed place of public amusement without such permit therefor shall be deemed a distinct and separable violation of this ordinance.

2. The State Department of Education shall not grant a permit to exhibit any motion picture, until an application in writing shall have been made therefor to the State Department of Education nor until the plates, films, rolls, or other like apparatus by or from which such motion picture is shown or produced shall be inspected by persons duly authorized by the State Department of Education from the teachers, examiners or supervising staff thereof for the work of censoring motion pictures nor until the motion picture itself shall be seen by the authorized inspectors.

In case such picture is approved by the Department of Education, it shall issue a permit in writing and in such form as the Bureau of Licenses shall prescribe.

3. If any motion picture for the exhibition of which an application for such permit is made, is an obscene, indecent, immoral or impure motion picture which would tend to the corruption of the morals of youth or others, or if it pictures any crime, any murder, suicide, robbery, holdup, stabbing, assaulting, clubbing or beating of any human being in such detail as to offend the sense of morality or decency, it shall be the duty of the State Department of Education to refuse such permit. Otherwise it shall be the duty of the State Department of Education to grant such permit.

In case any motion picture is declared by the inspectors authorized by the Department of Education to be of such a high degree of educational, moral, spiritual, religious or sacred character as to make it in keeping with the highest ideals of the American Sunday as set forth in the laws of New York, the Department of Education shall indicate that fact upon the permit by the use of these words: "Approved for Sundays and week days."

Only such motion pictures as are thus approved by the State Department of Education for Sunday use shall be used in such exhibitions of motion pictures as are permitted by law on Sunday.

4. In case the State Board of Education shall refuse to issue such permit the determination of the State Board of Education to refuse to grant a permit may be reviewed by writ of certiorari and the provisions of law and of practice in respect to the writ of certiorari to review the determination of an inferior tribunal shall be applicable thereto.

5. The permit provided for in this act shall be obtained for each and every motion picture and for all duplicates of the original films exhibited in any motion picture theatre, in any open air motion picture theatre, in every license theatre, or concert, and every licensed place of public amusement, and shall be required in addition to any license required by any local ordinance. A fee of $50.00 for each permit for an original film shall be paid to the State Department of Education and $10.00 for each duplicate of the original permit. The Department of Education shall retain 2-5 of the fees received from this source for the expenses of this inspection, and other work of the Department and shall pay 3-5 of the amount received quarterly to the treasurer of the State of New York.

6. When such permit to show or exhibit a motion picture is once issued to any applicant, such motion picture may be shown in any duly licensed place, provided that such written permit, clearly describing such motion picture, is actually delivered to the licensee of such motion picture theatre or other licensed place of public amusement. Any number of transfers of such permit may be made, provided always that such permit is actually delivered to such transferee.

7. The permit provided for in this act shall be posted at or near the entrance of the motion picture theatre or the open air motion picture theatre or any licensed place of public amusement where the motion picture permitted by such permit is being shown or exhibited at such a place and in such a position that such permit can easily be read by any person entering such theatre at any time when such motion picture is there being exhibited. The exhibition of any motion picture in any motion picture theatre or in any open air motion picture theatre or any licensed place of public amusement without the posting of such permit therefor shall be considered a violation of this ordinance; and each day's exhibition of any motion picture in any motion picture theatre or open air motion picture theatre, without the posting of such permit there shall be deemed a distinct and separate offense.

8. It shall be the duty of the State Department of Education to number all permits for motion pictures and to keep a record of all permits for motion pictures issued, both numerically and alphabetically arranged.

9. After the exhibiting of each motion picture, there shall be thrown upon the screen for at least 10 seconds a facsimile of the permit for the picture just shown, giving the name of the manufacturer, the name of the picture, and the number of the permit as recorded by the Bureau of Licenses. The licensee of each licensed place where motion pictures are exhibited shall keep a record book, open at all times to the public, in which shall be recorded, under the date or dates when it was shown, the name of each picture shown, the name of its manufacturer, the name and address of the owner of the film and the name and address of the person, firm or corporation from whom the film was rented or leased.

Any person violating the provisions of this act and every person aiding or abetting such act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and besides the penalty for a misdemeanor, the exhibition of any motion picture contrary to the provisions of this act itself annuls any license which may have been previously obtained by the manager, agent, owner or lessee using or letting the building, garden, room, place or other structure in which the violation of this act occurred.

The above is a copy of an act proposed to be introduced in the Legislature, after a few alteration, or corrections, and revision. If the manufacturers, exchange men, and the exhibitors want this act passed, let them give it their support. If not, then oppose it with all their power.

In my opinion it is illegal and cannot be passed until the Board of Education legislature is amended. The Board of Education has its duties well defined, and to saddle it with film censorship will work a hardship on an already overworked departmcnt.

EDITOR M. P. NEWS.

ECLAIR HAS NEWLYWEDS

The business seems to be tending toward features, clever comedies and educationals. On the heels of their announcement of a two or three-reel feature every week, the Eclair Company audience that they have the right to anthe famous Newlywed cartoons of McManus.

Snookums Newlywed is to be brought to life in a series of animated cartoons where the actual drawing is seen to move and go through all the funny antics depicted in the series as shown in the "funny sheets" of the Sunday papers.

These pictures are not only screamingly funny, but are wonderful in the fact that they are "animated cartoons," a decided novelty.

This series will be placed among the regular Sunday releases of the Eclair Company when they change their program to a two or three-reel feature on Wednesday and a single reel on Sunday in the Universal program.

The Newlywed pictures have been shown privately to a number of prominent exchange men and newspaper men, and everyone has been most enthusiastic over them.

IDEALS AND MOTION PICTURES

By H. Bedford-Jones

THE finest attribute of a moving picture is the quality of suggestiveness. It is rather a pity that we so mishandle our language as to turn the broad, comprehensive word "suggestive" into a narrow, unlovely word of reproach. We should use it as a term of appreciation, instead of as a term of depreciation, for the word is too valuable a one to be lost.

A suggestive moving picture should be one that suggests—what? Ideas, good or bad, is your prompt reply. Wrong. We only look to think for ideas after we begin to look down on the thing itself. Suppose you were your grandfather; you could pick ideas out of every tree and bush you passed, out of every person you met, out of all you saw. But if you suddenly witnessed a wonderful, unheard-of, and perhaps devilish motion picture, you would look for something far beyond ideas. You would look for ideals. Anything can suggest ideas, but it requires a very big and a very noble thing indeed to suggest ideals.

There is a curious and very deep-rooted distinction between these two words, which may or may not be connected with moving pictures according to the trend of your brain matter. As a concrete example, let us summon up history. When the Persians sacked Athens they were actuated by national ideas, which produce energy. When the Greeks sacked Babylon they were actuated by national ideals, which produce effects. Ideas have commonly failed in history, from Alcibiades to Philip the Second; ideals, on the other hand, have commonly succeeded, from Cato to Joan of Arc and Robespierre. Xerxes was one of those practical materialists who are so often doomed to failure; Alexander was one of those impractical idealists who so often revive the roots of the world.

For a long time the motion picture business has been actuated by ideas. It has become a part of our life, part of the ordinary grind, and we look down at it rather than look up to it. To-day, however, certain of the big producers are getting a grip on ideals, and bid fair to raise the business to its real level. Ideals grow very slowly and are long in taking root, but they last forever. Ideas grow old and change, while ideals have no sere.

It is a serious thing to attack our educational systems, which have taken so many thousand years to evolve. But they have not evolved; they have devolved. We laugh at the Mahometan system as stupid, but at least it is a great deal more consistent than the Christian system, for it is certainly insistent and ours is not. In consists of religion and insists on religion, and religion is purely a matter of ideals. Attack the Christian faith in the streets of Chicago and at the worst you would arouse a few fanatics to argument; attack the Mahometan faith in the streets of Tun's and at the best you would arouse a city of fanatics to bullets. This seems a wide digression from the subject, but it is not. We drum ideas into the heads of our children instead of ideals, for the very simple reason that our educational system, which should be an ideal, is only an idea.

And here, with the world rubbing its head and pondering over the difficulty, steps in the moving picture and presents a solution. Give the children ideas, it says, but let me give them ideals as well. And still the world is pondering. Why?

Because we have been fitting the child to our "system," instead of fitting our system to the child. We must accept the restlessness of a child and give it play, let it wear itself out in freedom. We must not encourage by repression but discourage by expression, and in view of this apparently trivial bit of psychology the moving picture is worth consideration. We bind the child to the system, but—would it not be possible to bind the system to the child? Most of us hate ideas on sight, but we always respect and weigh ideals, and possibly come to love them. Were his school to present ideals, the child might conceivably come to love it instead of hating it.

That the motion picture is an educational potentiality, there is no longer any doubt, but that it will enter largely into our school systems is a matter of debate. Education, however, is not limited to schools; it hardly begins in schools. It is not education, but that which one gets from education, that which education suggests to one, that is the desideratum. And unconsciously we educate ourselves to the level of our ideals.

Now, there is a connection between all these things—between religion and moving pictures and education and ideals, and the bit of child-psychology that seems so trivial. This connection is the slender, nebulous, unbreakable thread of suggestion, the wonderful quality that strikes fire from man's soul and leads his mind to the stars. It may lead him to the bottomless pit, but we have abandoned that meaning. Suggestion has a great deal to do with religion, and if I am not mistaken, there is some new religion founded altogether on this quality. It is intimately concerned with the other things also, for it is not unlikely that the fragment of psychology I presented is the key to the whole staggering problem of education. Froebel and the rest applied it to the kindergarten, and in Europe it is partially applied to higher schools, but we have not yet seen the—ideal.

"Where there is no vision, the people perish" is one of the most practical, mystical and thunderbolt texts that we have. For this vision means "ideal," and should have been translated so, perhaps. I do not say that we are in danger of perishing, but I am afraid that we are in danger of having no vision, as regards our educational work. A vision must be something that suggests, that shows us an endless vista of future possibilities, that drags us forward willy-nilly. Ask any educator if he can behold this tremendous invigorating vision ahead of his daily grind, and unless he be extremely poetical indeed he will answer no. Ask any moving picture producer if such a vision is open to him, and unless he be extremely prosaic indeed he will answer yes. He cannot help seeing this great ideal, even if he can only dimly sense it afar off.

To crystallize the whole argument, the moving picture should become an influence in education, for the moving picture alone has the power to suggest an ideal to the child-mind and to present it with the required delicacy. Despite all our care, thought and attention, our public school are torture-houses in childish minds. Ethically speaking, they are crimes against children; practically speaking, they are the best we have been able to give.

For twenty years the cry has arisen against our schools that their seats and desks ruin many children. Statistics have been produced by the page—fifty per cent of Etonians with curvature, ninety per cent of general spinal curvature throughout the world caused by school seats, etc. The indictment is admitted, but no remedy has been found, unless each child were to have a sort of Morris chair—which is visionary and altruistic and impractical. It is also very untidy. Oddly enough, some years back the Nazarenes were called by those same names, but in its very derision the world fell down to worship a vision. Why should not the schoolroom have a comfortable air of untidyness? It is very nice to have schools that are symmetrical and pleasing to the eye, but it is much nicer to have children who are symmetrical and pleasing to the eye.

The counts in the indictment are varied, and here comes in a very odd state of things. School physicians, for these various physical ailments of the children, prescribe that in school hours they be given a good deal of rest and exercise—which are exactly the two things children do not come to school to get. This argues inefficiency and lack of a vision. The fact of the matter is that we attempt to bring up a child as we do a tree, by binding him with ropes; in reality we can only bring him up by cutting his ropes.

It would be absurd to attack our system of education in toto, and I do not do this. It would be absurd to say that moving picture producers should be philanthropists. It would be still more absurd neither to attack our educational system at all nor to assume that producers might not be philanthropists. It is safe to assume that the film companies are not in the business for love only, but it is dangerous to assume that they are in the business for money only. The real business man lives in the future. He must make a living, but he wants to grave his mark on the future if possible, and if he has a vision he will do so inevitably. He must not be a liver, but a giver. Whether he deals in hemp or bonds or motion pictures, he must have some extraneous vision that pulls him forward and up. And no man, save only the religious enthusiast, can have a greater vision than he of the moving picture.

He can, but has he? That is the question. The vision is there, open to every man, woman and child who has a finger in the making and showing of a film, could they but see and grasp it. We may very often see a vision, an ideal, without being prepared to grasp it and let it lead us onward. The world is full of men, for example, who see the vision of Christianity and realize it, but who hold back from clutching it. They say that this vision has been thrust upon them by brute strength, and they refuse it. Now, had this particular vision been suggested to them (accepting their explanation as fact), it might have reached them; you cannot force a spiritual thing, such as education or religion, upon any man and expect him to grasp the ideal, the vision behind it. It must be unfolded before him, it must appeal to some fiber of him until it becomes his ideal.

"And what is this vision you talk about so knowingly? What is its tangible, concrete, knowable shape?"

I can best answer by metaphor, for at best visions are intangible, unknowable, but terribly matter-of-fact things to touch. Instead of writing, as so many of our writers do, about what happened (perhaps) two thousand or two million years ago, suppose the vision were given us of what will happen (perhaps) two hundred years hence. We would get a book that would stagger us, if it were written with any vision whatever before the writer. Suppose the vision to be that of the moving picture.

We would have a vivid picture of a new educational system, one that we had never dreamed of. We would see the school system extended into every branch of life, specialized for every class of business and work. We would see the children, the young men and women, the people of the world, subordinating the study of books to the study of pictures. Pictures are suggestive of ideals, while books are suggestive of ideas. The moving picture would not be as we know it, for it would be improved and extended in every way, in ways that we cannot yet imagine.

Art, religion, politics—everything in the world would be dominated by the moving picture, for remember that this would be a book of a vision. It would be exaggerated, just as every vision exaggerates itself to those who hold it. We never attain our vision; our vision attains us before we know it. The Socialist party will never bring the world to Socialism; but the world will bring Socialism to the Socialist party. That is the inevitable paradox of the ideal. The French nation shattered Europe to attain an ideal; then, when all was lost and France riven asunder, Europe gave her people their vision. And so with the great vision that underlies the moving picture.

GEORGE DAVIDSON, AGE 15, THE YOUNGEST STAGE MANAGER IN THE UNITED STATES.

He superintends the stage at the Princess Theatre, owned and controlled by Brown & Anderson at Boone, Iowa, running vaudeville and pictures with a seating capacity of five hundred (500). He has been running the stage for the past four years and is as competent as many operators twice his age. He is the only support of a widowed mother.

THE TALE OF THE MAN WHO LIKED MOVING PICTURES

There was once a Sordid, Commonplace Man whose wife went in heavily for Art, whereas the only kind of Pictures he cared anything about were those of the Moving Variety. In an effort to cultivate his Esthetic Tastes, she took him abroad and dragged him through the great Art Galleries, where he Embarrassed her by evincing a desire to pause before pictures such as "The Temptation of Aunt Sainthony," at which she wouldn't look except when there wasn't anybody around.

Being of an Emotional Nature, and fond of a Good Cry, the wife used to stop and weep before all the Sad Pictures —of which there were only a few, being in this respect different from many of our American Exhibitions, in which the pictures are nearly all Sad. At this, her husband, who was entirely destitute of Temperament, scoffed rudely.

"Oh, pickles!" he said Unsuavely. "The noise you are emitting sounds like the Soul of a Lost Whale. Do you really enjoy bellowing thus before the picture of a Poor Widow who was compelled to eat her children to keep from starving to death? As for me, I prefer the other kind of Moving Pictures."

So saying, he wandered off and asked the Liveried Attendant to point out to him Leonardo da Vinci's "Mona Lisa," of which he had often Heard; but the Guard told him that it had become a Moving Picture. This, however, served only to confirm the husband's good opinion of his own Good Opinion in all matters pertaining to Art.

And the husband is still Sordid and Commonplace, and he still likes Moving Pictures.—February Lippincott's.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

The Edison Policy

Alfred H. Saunders, editor of the Moving Picture News, drives home a significant statement in a recent editorial on "Scenarios." "In all the reports I have received from the censorship boards throughout the country, not a single word has been spoken against the Edison films." This is a highly complimentary assertion—and it is a true one. There is really no cause for wonderment. Mr. H. G. Plimpton, manager of Negative Production, is the brains of the Edison editorial department. We have watched his methods interestedly for several years past. He takes unusual care in selecting his stories; they must be logical, convincing, clean. In other words, a consistently high standard is intelligently maintained. Furthermore, Mr. Plimpton is a man of broad education. He knows literature and, in that knowledge, he is capable of choosing material that will appeal to the better element.

If a Dickens, Scott, or more ancient classic is to be filmed, Mr. Plimpton has authority and sees to it that his directors produce it with sympathy and aecuracy. Historical drama, comedy, educationals, etc., the same eare, thought and knowledge is evident. It has become a much-sought honor for picture playwrights to have their work accepted by the Edison Company. They know that such acceptance means their work is well-nigh perfect, just as the fiction writer who finally lands a story or article in Scribner's or Harper's feels, somehow, that he has finally arrived.

And how has Edison reached this enviable standing? Simply because a high standard was determined upon and kept by a manager who has the literary knowledge, not superficial knowledge, but a thorough knowledge, of good literature, and hence the mentality to know refined and advanced work. System, the knack of writing plots, a knowledge of the business as it pertains to his department, these are all necessary qualifications for the script editor. But above all these is the higher literary education; the knowledge of good books and what they contain, and the sympathetic appreciation of high-class work with or without the usual ending. Many of the script editors and directors have this literary education, and the releases show it. Others otherwise qualified are not so widely read and their releases show it.

The Motion Picture Story Magazine "Philosopher" argues that the "schools" for script writers are benefieial. But the "Philosopher" confesses during the course of his argument that he knows nothing personally for or against the "courses." We have read fifteen different "courses" submitted to us by writers and others. We have read hundreds of scripts written by the "graduates." We feel that we can speak from experience when we unhesitatingly state that two out of three of these "courses" are not worth the paper they are written upon. Furthermore, we have published statements from such editors as Plimpton, Warren, McCloskey, Hoadley, Schulberg, Vinton and others, and, without exception, they score the correspondence "schools." These men speak without fear or favor. They are in a position to know whereof they speak. Script writers should heed their advice.

Letters of Rejeetion

A script editor asked us the other day as to what was our idea of a courteously worded rejection slip. Speaking as a picture playwright, we admit that all rejection slips "look bad to us." However, they are a necessary evil. Here is a nifty little thing used by Everybody's Magazine:

> We thank you for your courtesy in submitting this manuscript for our consideration. In returning it, we do not mean in any sense to reflect upon its merits. Many reasons govern the availability of manuscript. We may have on hand several stories of the same character, or it may not harmonize with the general policy. It is impossible for us to give reasons in each case. We shall be pleased to eonsider other contributions of yours as you may be pleased to submit them.

Then one from Collier's Weekly:

> We beg to return herewith the enelosed manuscript, which we regret we are unable to use. We wish to say, however, that rejeetion does not in any way reflect upon the value of the manuscript and that it is not necessarily unavailable for use in other periodicals. It simply indicates that the matter is not suited for the present needs of Collier's.

The magazine editor and the script editor have much in common. Neither can take the time to explain the weaknesses of contributions, for they read thousands of manuscripts yearly. A courteously worded rejection slip is appreciated by the writer of good sense whose judgment will inform him that there are many others to think of also by the hard-working editors.

Just an Example

The following is just an example of letters we receive occasionally from professional fiction writers, who should know better. When the magazine writer does not immediately succeed in the script writing profession, sometimes he or she becomes a nuisance.

> I am going to write to you because I have heard of you more than any other person in scenario writing. You know of my magazine work, of course, but I wish to write scenarios if I have any success. I have had six refused and will be nothing daunted if I can get at the gist of the matter. It is this: Every article on the subject tells what wonderful plays are required and how they have to be rewritten, etc., before they can be produced. In this case, then, what becomes of them, as they eertainly never appear on the screen. I read the Mirror, Photoplay and Motion Picture Story Magazines, the Photoplay Author Magazine and the News. I frequently attend as many as eight shows an afternoon in Chicago, just to "get into" the work and, honestly, no "sour grapes," but I don't see more than two in ten worth looking at. Now you, in all justice, know that this is true. Do the editors do most of the writing? If more outside manuscripts were used wouldn't the output be better? One could hardly expect to see good work emanate constantly from the same person.
> If I have no chance against the editors there is no use in wasting my time. Answer these two questions: Do the companies really buy plays, or do they have a staff to write them? Do they always return manuscripts and, if so particular about plays, why do not some of the good ones show up?

The companies really do buy plays and some of them retain a staff of writers also. They do not always return the manuscripts; they eonsider the unusual scripts, providing any show up in the mail. This magazine writer is in a elass by herself. She asserts that "not more than two in ten are worth looking at." The other 2,999,999 patrons of picture theatres think differently because attendance at moving picture theatres is increasing right along. This lady is miffed because she has had six scripts rejected. We would advise her to show the same pluck and spirit proven in her magazine work when she probably had considerably more than six stories rejected before she made good. We had numerous seripts rejected years ago before we sold one, yet we refused to become discouraged and to take up the old wail of "I see many worse ones on the screen than the ones I write." If we had stopped there, we'd never have had a successful script to our credit. We have given considerable space to this letter to show the rank and file of picture playwtights just what a professional fiction writer can pull off when in the mood. This writer really doesn't mean what she says. She is disgruntled because six scripts were returned to her. Maybe she is saving her real good plots to use in her magazine stories and is laboring under the idea that "any old thing" is good enough for the "movies." Only the best is now considered by script editors and the sooner some of the fiction writers entering the field appreciate this fact, the more quickly will they succeed.

One statement made by this correspondent is pertinent. It is a fact that good work cannot emanate constantly from the same person. A staff writer, no matter how experienced or versatile, cannot write three or four scripts weekly up to standard. And, incidentally, we might remark that some of the releases of certain manufacturers prove this to be a fact.

The Order of Optimists

A Van Buren Powell, of Brooklyn, N. Y., president of the Order of Optimists, feels it incumbent upon him to revive that once flourishing organization since he has read the verses contributed to this department recently. The watchword of this order, which numbers many thousands of script writers as active members since its organization a year ago, is keep Sweet. President Powell incidentally drops into poetry to give vent to his feelings. His proclamation:

Ods bodkins! Again! And right here, in the territory of the Optimistic Order! I refer, of course, to that poem—that poem that out-kippered Kipling and out-pessimized old Pess himself. I thought everybody had joined the Optimists, and lo! here crops out and blossoms forth one whom we must convert. Give me his address, or give him mine, and let us get together. I want to keep up the reputation of the Order and bring this (at present) foe to be a (presently) friend. Here goes:

A scribe there was, and he scrawled a script
(Even as you and I)
When it came back, all rejection-slipped,
He vowed that the editor should be whipped,
And he wrote a rave that roared and ripped.
(Even as you) and—aye!

The howls we waste, and the growls we waste
And the wear on typewriter keys
As we sit and seethe and sweat and stew
And seek to make black a world all too blue
By writing a letter we e'er shall rue
To the one whom we strive to please.

A scribe there was, and he scrawled a script.
(Even as you and I)
But he sate him down, when his play came back,
And let it get cold; took another tack,
Wrote it over; got off the beaten track;
Made a play any firm would buy.

Oh, it isn't the croaks and sarcastic jokes
That help our plays to sell;
'Tis taking the effort we'd waste in rhyme
To better our work, and by THAT to climb
To the goal called success, which we'll reach in time.
JOIN THE OPTIMISTS AND DO WELL.

The Value of System

Be systematic in your work. Get a book or ledger. List every script written by its title. Note when sent out, to whom, the date of its return, or the date of its sale, the postage per submission and remarks There are many systems affected by many writers. Plan out your own and make it as simple as possible. Be systematic, know where your scripts are and what you are accomplishing.

Keep Within Reason

Instead of asking the producer to supply battleships, Sahara deserts and aeroplanes, keep within the bounds of reason. Do not plot expensive or well-nigh impossible properties or settings for your story. The original script, that can be produced the least expensively, invariably appeals to editor and director.

Up to the Editor

A picture playwright compliments us for seeking credit for the writer on the film and at the same time censures us for not printing the authors' names in the stories of the films. We will gladly print them, providing the publicity men furnish them. Edison and Lubin are doing it; why not the others?

Single and Double Spacing

When you write magazine or newspaper copy, double or triple space, always. This gives the editor, particularly the newspaper editor, an opportunity to write in between the lines, to blue pencil easily, and it adds attractiveness to the copy. Either method will do for the moving picture manuscript, although personally we single space our scripts, using the first page for title, synopsis and cast, and the next two or three pages for action. Make it a rule to have your complete synopsis on the one page, it makes convenience for the reader. It makes little difference to the average script editor whether you double or single space your scripts, providing there is something striking to space.

A Hint from Ruskin

A thought from Ruskin comes to us this week: "It is of the greatest importance in these days of book-deluge to keep out of the salt swamps of literature and live on a little rocky island of your own, with a spring and a lake in it, pure and good."

Isn't the above applicable to pictureplay writing?

WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT.

GREAT NORTHERN SCENICS

In addition to its regular releases, the Great Northern Film Company is presenting a series of scenic films which should prove of interest, not only because of their excellency in photography, but also because of the subjects selected. Scenic views of the rugged coasts of Norway, Sweden and Denmark are rarely presented, and it has remained for the Great Northern Film Company to present these in addition to a number of landscape and agricultural views. Among the latter are views of Jutland on the coast of Denmark, and in this are shown marine views and also the activities of the farmer folk. This is said to be particularly interesting because it depicts the vim and energy with which the rugged peasant folk reap their harvests.

Another instructive series of motion picture views are to be seen in a series of views off Kullen, a cape on the west coast of Sweden. These pictures were taken from the deck of a steamship and the effect is said to be most realistic from an educational standpoint. The Great Northern Company intends making a specialty of scenic subjects for the purpose of meeting the demands for educational subjects.

MISS LILLIAN RUSSELL IN KINEMACOLOR

It would be hard to tell who is more pleased with the natural color motion pictures of Miss Lillian Russell recently taken at the Kinemacolor studios in California—the fair subject thereof, or Henry J. Brock, president of the American corporation, who undertook to furnish moving illustrations of the celebrated American beauty's forthcoming lecture, entitled "How to Live 100 Years." Miss Russell is the most photographed actress of the American stage, and a keen critic when it comes to pictures of herself. On the other hand, she is one of the best posers who ever faced a camera, and knows more about artistic lines and lights than the average operator. Therefore, when Miss Russell approached the Kinemacolor Company of America with a proposition to make a series of motion pictures, showing the day's regimen of a well-groomed woman—appropriately impersonated by herself—Mr. Brock undertook the contract with enthusiasm. At the same time he realized that this would be one of the most delicate tests of Kinemacolor, which has triumphantly reproduced the beauties of Nature in hues of her own creation. But the personal portraiture of a famous beauty, to the satisfaction of herself and hosts of admirers familiar with her features as seen on the stage, or through the monochrome medium of thousands of photographs and printed pictures, was a task that might have staggered the greatest portrait painter.

LILLIAN RUSSELL (IN THE CENTER), HER SISTER, MRS. ROSS (TO LEFT), AND LADIES OF THE KINEMACOLOR STOCK HAVING TEA AT THE STUDIOS NEAR LOS ANGELES, CALIFORNIA

One of a series of color moto-photos illustrating Miss Russell's lecture entitled: "How to Live 100 Years." Opening at Orchestra Hall, Chicago, February 24th.

Nevertheless Mr. Brock foresaw the rewards of success and overlooked no opportunity to achieve it. He placed at Miss Russell's disposal for two whole weeks in December the completely equipped Kinemacolor plant in California, and under the expert direction of David Miles, with the assistance of Gaston Bell and other members of the five stock companies, the task was completed. Those who have been privileged to get a private view of the finished films proclaim them the most remarkable motion pictures for delicacy of coloring and characteristic portraiture that have ever been made. Miss Russell's wonderful complexion seems to live and glow upon the screen, and her blonde beauty, which has made her famous the world over, is revealed as was never possible in black and white—or even under the artificial footlight glare.

Not only the color, but the very texture of the various garments—intimate as well as elaborate, with which Miss Russell adorns herself to point the moral of her lecture, will be revealed by Kinemacolor process to her hearers; and later, at the termination of her tour, the pictures will be released for the benefit of Kinemacolor patrons the world over. Thus, Miss Russell will make a globe-trotting tour in the multichrome pictures without personally leaving her native land, and Mr. Brock will show his foreign confreres, who are seeking natural beauties everywhere, how the Kinemacolor Company of America has captured the finest flower of Nature and civilization—a beautiful woman from boudoir to ballroom.

The best evidence of mutual satisfaction with this pictorial experiment is the fact that Mr. Brock has secured Miss Russell for the role of Lady Teazle in the elaborate Kinemacolor production of "The School for Scandal," while later she will revive in the colored reels her famous impersonation of "The Grand Duchess" in the Milloecker operetta which she made so popular. It is also probable that a bevy of stage beauties, realizing that Miss Russell has found the right medium for preserving her charms in lifelike pictures, will flock to the Kinemacolor studios determined to do likewise.

NORTH STAR AMUSEMENT CO. OPENS NEW THEATRE

At the corner of One Hundred and Sixth street and Fifth avenue, New York, the North Star Amusement Company will shortly open a beautiful new house seating over 1,000 people. Motion pictures will be shown exclusively. Through Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," they have purchased two latest model Simplex projecting machines. Mr. Hallberg also reports the sale of an Edison Model B. machine with Hallberg A. C. Economizer to Union Electric Supply Company, of Providence, R. I., and also another of the same make machine to Chas. P. Gilmore, Oswego, N. Y. Also Powers No. 6A to Lawler Bros., Greenfield, Mass.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT FILM MEETS

Kinemacolor

Some especially fine offerings in Kinemacolor were exhibited to the press this week. They were as follows: "With the Servian Army Before Adrianople," embodying some tremendously interesting scenes from the seat of war. "A Romance of the Canadian Wilds," in which a young New York artist seeks the wilds across the border in order to gain inspiration. He falls in love with a beautiful young Canadian girl, arousing the jealousy of the girl's former lover to such an extent that the life of the artist is endangered. The story, however, ends happily without murder. In this picture the atmosphere obtained and maintained is one of its chief charms. "Fifty Miles from Tombstone," a comedy-drama, is also quite acceptable. But perhaps the most charming film of the day was entitled "Lower Lake Geneva, Switzerland," a most magnificent scenic.

Biograph

"Brothers," from Biograph, is another sample of remarkable directorship. The conception of this story, and the actors fitting so splendidly into their different roles make this a film for special mention.

Essanay

"The Ranchman's Blunder" is a drama which could stand a little more originality of theme. It is the same old thing, a Western love story with the same gun accident. It is, nevertheless, interesting in a measure.

Rex

"At Midnight" has an unusual grip to it. The smoothness with which this story has been produced reflects great credit on the Rex Company. It has originality of theme, and has been so splendidly produced, photographed, etc., that it cannot fail to please. This story as a drama will fit any occasion.

Imp

"The Man Outside" has merit as a drama with unusual interest. The detail of the producing end has been carefully attended to, and it is a film specially adapted to theatre purposes.

Lubin

"Private Smith," a story of the coward and the hero, holds the interest of the audience from first to last.

Gaumont

"On the Brink of Dishonor" is an exceedingly well produced picture. Although as a photographic gem it will attract the bulk of the admiration, it may inspire. "Love Thy Neighbor" and "Watch Your Watch" are fair comedies—not at all unusual, but pleasing.

Lux

"A Modern Architect" and "Leopold and the Leopard" are two comedies of the farce order with no special merit. The second mentioned would, however, be the choice of the two.

Frontier

"The Ranch Girl's Measurements" is rich in comedy, and will get a laugh every time it is shown The young woman of the story, a bright light among the ranchmen, has promised to marry the one who buys her the exact number of yards of cloth for a dress, no less nor no more than just enough. The situation allows for plenty of fun.

Bison 101

"In the Red Man's Country" has been very acceptably staged in two reels. In this film are some remarkably beautiful exterior scenes. There is nothing so remarkable about the story itself, but the action and careful production of the piece carry it.

Selig

"The Cowboy Millionaire" is one of the best comedies which we have seen filmed in some time. It is in two reels, and treats of the story of a rich cowboy who after marrying and entering socity, gets tired of the lack of excitement and sends for his friends to liven up the town. This film is a scream from beginning to end.

Vitagraph

"Classmates' Frolic," with our beloved Flora Finch figuring largely in the development of the story, is what it cannot help being with Miss Finch anywhere near, and that is, good comedy.

Solax

"Overcoats" is a good story which could have been better handled. However, the comedy of the situation stands for itself.

"The Monkey Accomplice," comedy-drama, has a fair amount of interest.

Powers

"The Man Higher Up," in comedy form, is sure to get a laugh. It is the story of a magistrate and his son, who thinking well each of the other, meet accidentally one night in a cafe and make a night of it. The place is raided and the magistrate returns to his office just in time to have his son and the others of the party appear before him.

Crystal

"Strictly Business" is a very poor excuse for a comedy. The plot is much too transparent. "An Awful Scare" on the same reel is distasteful. We do not want to look at coffins until we have to, even if they do appear in comedy.

Eclair

"For the Child's Sake," from Eclair, is a drama with more than the usual amount of interest. This film is to be highly recommended.

Nestor

"The Mystery Cave" has a good deal of merit, but "mystery cave" is too blatantly an artificial contrivance to carry much atmosphere with it.

RYNO PICTURES NOT THE SAME

They are different from the others; their standard seems to be one of merit and enterprise. Ryno Company haven't yet announced their affiliation with any independent body, but already the exhibitors have evinced an interest in the product of the new brand, and are waiting to hear through whom they can obtain Ryno. The plant at City Island is busy making pictures that will "tell the story." Jack Noble, the erstwhile Universal director, is bending every effort to establish a new record in film manufacture. By the way, his production entitled "Absinthe," which was made for the Universal, is being talked about as an unusual and gifted production.

The latest Ryno production is a meritorious picture. The story is tense, the acting sincere and convincing, and the photography clear. It is Ryno's ambition to surpass the average brand on the market.

We are waiting to learn through which channel Ryno will reach the market.

EDWARD ELSNER JOINS HANDS WITH GENERAL FILM PUBLICITY & SALES COMPANY

The eminent producer and playwright, Mr. Edward Elsner, has to his credit more successes than any other man of his age in the dramatic world, having been associated with such plays as "Bought and Paid For." "Within the Law," and many other successes which have gained world-wide reputation. He is also the inventor of numerous mechanical stage effects, among which "The Sand Storm" used in "Under Two Flags," has been the foundation of many startling effects produced since then. He is equally well known in England and France and has been associated with the most noted stars of our day. Mr. Elsner, finding that the General Film Publicity & Sales Company, the pioneer in launching high-class dramatic productions such as Nat C. Goodwin as Fagin in "Oliver Twist," etc., and realizing the future possibilities in moving pictures as well as in the legitimate, has affiliated himself as an officer and director of the General Film Publicity & Sales Company He has taken over the entire charge of their producing end of the business.

The General Film Publicity & Sales Company has reorganized and the former secretary and director, Henry W. Ebann, is no longer connected with this firm. He has been succeeded by M. B. Barth as vice-president and treasurer. Mr. Edward Elsner was elected secretary and director, H. A. Spanuth retaining the presidency.

The future policy of this organization will be to produce only the highest and best obtainable in the motion picture industry.

THE moving picture is regarded with fear by the theatrical managers. They are all afraid of the pictures' popularity, and one would think that some pronounced and new theatrical policy would be taken to combat Cinematography. Poor "shows" with high prices will never prove effective rivals to the moving pictures. And a tendency toward lower priees for theatrical entertainments is evident here and there. One notices in several cities many offerings scheduled at high prices the early part of the season are now advertised at "popular" rates. There is no reason why moving pictures should ever cause worry to managers who produce good plays honestly. There is room for both. The moving picture business is surely flourishing. More and more are the downtown theatres in every city becoming motion picture houses. The noticeable change from cheap vaudeville to an entire program of good motion pictures is certainly a cause for unqualified rejoicing. Clear pictures, well projected, are infinitely to be preferred to cheap vaudeville, from every point of view.

Giles R. Warren, the versatile director of those popular Victor pictures, lives in Dumont, N. J. He is an enthusiastic member of the Dumont Fire Department and purchased a red helmet, hip boots, and a trumpet in his offieial capacity as second assistant vice-chief. He also installed a big gong in his bedchamber. There were many false alarms and the family got tired. One day they removed the gong unknown to Director Warren. That same night the house next door burned down and Mr. Warren slept peacefully through all the excitement. When he found out next morning what had happened, he resigned.

While the producers are crying for more educational subjects for the pictures, why do they not look around about them and film some of the vital questions of the day? There are some big questions now being considered in this country and we have so far failed to see many of them forming the basic idea for moving picture plays. For instance, the present public school system is being almost universally eriticised among the thinking people. It is claimed that the average high school graduate is better fitted to drive a delivery wagon than to perform any important duty in life, after he leaves school. The majority of the boys do not enter college, and a knowledge of the dead languages does not bring in much salary after they are turned forth to fight the practical battles of life. Here is a fundamental idea that could be studied and filmed and would be appreciated by many anxious parents.

Preparatory school secret societies and fraternities are also being considered a menace for boys of this country. The college fraternity has its place, but many high school "frats" exist contrary to law, and such organizations poison the civie character of the boy. Cannot some farseeing producer look into the question and give us a convincing and educating play with the certain lesson?

It has also been discovered by Superintendent Ella Flagg Young, of the Chieago public schools, that there is a sad lack of knowledge of good manners among high school girls Mrs. Young says:

> "We need a dean of women in the high schools of this country. We need them so that girls can acquire not only education but the fine manners."

A great woman says that the schoolgirls of this country are lacking in that womanly grace that is a part of a true education. Bad manners in school boys or girls should be carefully remedied, for they are demoralizing and destructive of character, if they are not a sign of depravity already begun The coming generation is the hope of our nation. The moving pictures can well further such educational crusades.

Horace Vinton, the well-known author, late director for the Comet company, recently accepted a short engagement through the "provinces" as leading man with "The Call of the Heart" theatrical company. He has been getting all the press notices and the "big hands." He was playing in Cincinnati the other week when some former moving pieture players happened into a box. Horaee came on and was immediately recognized. Before he could start his lines one old-time acquaintance, who had looked upon the wine when it is red, rose enthusiastically and remarked: "Horace, this is easier money than movin' pieture work. What?" It almost broke up the performance.

Daniel Frohman has signed a contraet which will permit James K. Hackett to appear in motion pietures of "The Prisoner of Zenda." Frohman was always a progressive man. He is now proving that age and experience do not cause him to settle down into a rut, but that he is fully able to recognize the growing importanee and popularity of the moving picture and to ably eope with conditions as they are. Hackett will appear in the Famous Players Film Company presentation of Anthony Hope's novel. Many years ago we witnessed .E H. Sothern's delineation of Rudolph Rassendiel at the old Hooley's Theatre, Chieago. The play should go great in the pietures. Hope wrote "The Prisoner of Zenda," whieh is full of rich, red blood, after tinkering around with "Dolly Dialogues." He ereated a new school of romantic fiction. Stanley Weyman, some years ago, revamped Dumas in "Under the Red Robe," "The House of the Wolf," and "A Gentleman of France." Anthony Hope went him one better in plotting "The Prisoner of Zenda" and "Rupert of Hentzau." He created an entirely new school of romantic fiction and, like Sir Conan Doyle, has been unfortunate in having his ideas rewritten in different novels ever sinee. We await with interest Mr. Hackett's appearance in "The Prisoner of Zenda." It will be an entertaining and elaborate addition to the moving pictures.

According to a story friends of Horace G. Plimpton are telling, Mr. Plimpton, in the course of the day's business, had occasion to return a scenario to a budding picture playwright. Mr. Plimpton is manager of produetions of the Edison company, and has to order manuscripts rejected sometimes, although it pains him so to do. The author in question wrote a real sassy letter to the Edison company. Mr. Plimpton replied in his usual courteous way, and is reported to have stated thusly:

> "We regret that you have taken umbrage."

And then the reputed reply was this:

> "You charge me with having taken umbrage. I wish to inform you that I am not a thief, and never took anything that did not belong to me in my life."

We have had something to say recently on the poster question. Exceptions have been taken to our arguments, in certain instances, but we feel that we are eorreet in our attitude and see no reason for withdrawing our assertions. We repeat that, in our opinion, the moving picture theatre is much better off without the lurid and sensational posters and banners. Posters quiet and tasteful in eoloring, and presenting the merits of the picture truthfully, are to be desired. The sensational poster and the gaudy banners are not to be desired. They lower the tone and the standard of the entire industry, and at a time when the business is assuming added dignity and importance. The refined and educated element, so desired by the exhibitor as steady patronage, will never be tempted into the theatre by flamboyant and misleading advertising. Give your place of entertainment an atmosphere of refinement and dignity and then uneonsciously will the sense of its respectability and worth be impressed upon passersby. The rank and file will feel that here, at least, they can invariably get their money's worth; and the stranger to the pieture theatre will more readily be attracted. Taboo the cheap banners and the unrefined illustrated songs and ultimately profit thereby. One argument is that "the others do it and we must, too, in order to get business." A mistaken argument. If the others all do it, you will win out sooner or later by the law of refined contrast and originality.

When Neil G. Caward, editor of the Photoplay Magazine, was searching for an associate editor, he was attracted by the writings and the picture plays turned out by A. W. Thomas. Mr. Caward summoned Mr. Thomas into Chicago. The meeting proved very pleasant.

"What is your occupation?" asked Mr. Caward

"I'm a newspaperman," replied Mr. Thomas.

"So am I—that is, I used to be, and hence, ever will be. You're hired," said Caward.

Paul Leroy died of heart disease in a Sandusky, O., moving picture theatre, while trying to answer questions concerning the film story put at him in rapid succession by his two little children sitting at his side. This should prove as a warning to others not to endeavor to explain some of the vague stories presented only too often on the screen.

A NEW METHOD OF TEACHING MODERN HISTORY

A classic name in American literature has become identified with a new method of teaching modern history. A striking illustration in "The Literary Digest" of January 11 shows "A Class in History of the Present"—one class of only a baker's dozen from the more than four hundred girls who are studying The Literary Digest in the Washington Irving High School, New York City. It appears, from an article accompanying the illustration, that Dr. William H. Maxwell, superintendent of schools, recently sent out to all the city teachers a circular, saying:

"Many pupils have a not unnatural suspicion of 'classics.' They have a natural interest in what other people are reading and talking about. They should be induced to read the better magazines. This will tend to overcome the prevalent misconception in the minds of young students that literature belongs to the past."

The "Washington Irving" is the largest high school in Greater New York, and probably in the country, having an enrollment of 4,764 pupils. An immense new edifice is now nearing completion, on Irving Place, to house them. Miss Jean Davidson, one of its teachers, tells how they use "The Digest," and what its impressions are upon the students. From "an interesting collection of opinions of the girls themselves," these expressions are quoted by her: "I like this because I want to know what is going on in the world to-day"; "I think this is keeping me from growing one-sided"; "I begin to know what people are talking about"; "I like to read about live men instead of dead ones"; "My father says he is glad I am doing one thing in school he understands and sees the use of"; "I was able to show my brother he didn't know everything."

INTERNATIONAL CINEMATOGRAPH EXHIBITION AT LONDON, ENGLAND

From March 22-29th next, there will take place in London, the first International Cinematograph Exhibition. All the arts and industries which are allied to the Cinematograph and Cinematograph theatres, in whatever way, whether directly or indirectly, will take part.

On this occasion a large Congress will take place to which the most distinguished members in all branches have been invited, and in the large majority of cases have consented to speak.

Among the competitions arranged may be noted:

(1) For the best operator.
(2) For the best pianist.
(3) For the best poster.
(4) For the best and most useful invention.

In all these cases money prizes, and gold, silver and bronze medals will be offered.

PILOT FILMS CORPORATION

We beg to call special notice to our front cover showing a picture of the first release of the Pilot Films Corporation, incidentally would like to mention that this company is laying itself out to excel, in every respect, any production now on the market. It is making special "one-reel feature films." In future their aim will be to even "better the best," and for this cause will pay a larger fee for scenarios selected. To show the care in which they are working, the third release selected was a comedy subject, and after seeing it on the screen, "Pilot" Magee decided that it was not good enough for the Pilot Films Corporation, and so it was placed on a high shelf and another film substituted in its place. "Pilot" Magee reports very gratifying results of his visit to the exchange men, and if their policy is carried out in all its details, none but the very best pictures will appear on the screen.

AN AWFUL SCARE

By Virginia West

(Adapted from Crystal Release)

"Goin' anywhere to-night?" asked Holtz as he came into the delicatessen store belonging to Shultz. Shultz hesitated a moment, toying with a shred of sauerkraut which peeped from under the lid of the bowl containing that delectable food.

"I might go down in the city for a while," he said with a brave attempt at indifference in the matter.

"Got an engagement with a girl, have you?"

"No, oh, no!" Shultz looked up quickly with an expression that told Holtz he was on the wrong track.

"Well, I know you're out for some kind of a lark, and unless you got an engagement you're playing Smaltz and me dirt not to take us along."

Shultz walked around the counter and arranged the sausages more symmetrically.

"Say, old man, come on; tell us what's up. Have you been let in on something new?"

"Well, to tell you the truth, I'm going to do a little investigating of a matter I've heard about."

"Well, take me along as assistant, will you? I'm dyin' of slow torture in this place I haven't been down in the city for six weeks," pleaded Holtz.

"Well, the cars are always ready to take you—if you have a little patience. I don't know that anybody's had you tied."

"I know that. But, you know, Shultzie, you always find such nice, entertaining things to do."

"Think you'll flatter me, do you?"

"No," insisted Holtz, "it's a fact."

Shultz ate a pickeled onion and pushed the bowl toward Holtz. "I'll tell you, then, if you're bound to know where I'm going," he said finally when the onion had been chewed fine enough to satisfy the most exacting Fletcherite.

Holtz waited in excited silence.

"I'm going to a seance."

"To a—what?"

"A seance."

"You've got me."

"Well, then, a spiritualist meeting."

Holtz backed away a little. "Say, Shultz, have you lost your mind and become one of them?" he asked almost in a whisper?"

"No, I haven't. I don't believe in it at all, but I was told some things by a man who had been and I thought I'd go and investigate. I told you I was going to investigate, didn't I? I don't believe in it at all."

"W—ell, I don't believe in it, either, but it makes me feel kind of creepy. I'll go though, if you'll let me," added Holtz quickly when he saw Shultz grin.

"Oh, yes, you may go. I don't mind in the least," answered Shultz, transferring another onion from the bowl to his mouth.

That evening about half-past six the two men were about to step onto a car headed for New York, when they heard a sharp, familiar whistle.

"Hello, Smaltz," they both called, "going to town?"

"Yep. Better hurry."

They all swung aboard as the car started to move.

"Where you fellows going?" asked Smaltz when they were seated.

Silence reigned for sueh a long period that Smaltz said, "For heaven's sake, you must be going to do something awful. Gee, but you do look sheepish. This is evidently no place for a minister's son."

"You're crazy, Smaltz" said Holtz indignantly. "You know Shultzie and I don't do things we're ashamed of."

"Of course we don't," added Shultz.

"Well, it looks queer to me, that's all," insisted Smaltz.

Shultz moved a bit uneasily in his seat for a while. Then he said to Holtz. "Perhaps we'd better tell him."

"Well, you tell him. You know more about it, you know. It's really your plan. I don't know very much about it."

Shultz cast a withering glance at Holtz and then turned to his other friend.

"You see," he began, "I am somewhat of an investigator. When I hear of a new subject or of something I don't know about, I want to go at once and find out all I can. See?"

"Oh, yes, I see," answered Smaltz. "But, for heaven's sake, come to the point and tell me what you're going to investigate."

"Well, the other day a fellow came into my store and told me he had had a most remarkable experience."

"Yes?"

"He said he had been to a spiritualistic seance and had seen his mother-in-law."

"Are you looking for a mother-in-law? You can have mine."

"I'm looking for anything I can see. Holtz begged me to take him along, so I finally consented."

"Do you believe in that rot?" asked Smaltz.

"Well, I can't say that I do. In fact, I can say I don't, but I want to know how it is done," Shultz replied.

"There was silence among the three men for several minutes. Then Holtz said, "Say, Shultzie, did the man say he really saw his mother-in-law? Did it look like her and talk like her?"

"He said it looked like her and it said it was his mother-in-law, but he said that she said she was sorry for the way she had treated him when she was alive."

"So mothers-in-law improve, do they? Well, it's a good thing," said Smaltz. Turning to Holtz, he said, "Say, Holtz, haven't you got a mother-in-law dead?"

"Yep, she's dead," replied Holtz pleasantly.

"Maybe they make a specialty of mother-in-law spooks. By jinks, I'll go, too, and we'll see if we can get Holtz's mother-in-law."

"No, you don't. I don't want her. You fellows can just let her alone," exclaimed Holtz excitedly.

"Well, if she came of course we'd have to investigate her in the interest of—of—what do you call it?" asked Shultz.

"I don't know, but I take no interest in her," grumbled Holtz.

"It's something that has two words and the first one has some P's and S's and things all mixed up. I don't know." Shultz was mumbling softly to himself, entirely indifferent to the protestations of Holtz.

"Well, I'm going along," said Smaltz with finality. "You've whetted my appetite for a good lively spook."

When the car stopped at the corner of Broadway and Twenty-first street the three men alighted and walked westward to Eighth avenue. The number they wanted was soon found and the three began to climb the dark, steep staircase to the third floor.

When Shultz stopped on the next to the top step a bell rang somewhere and a man was apparently thrust automatically into the narrow hall from the front room.

"Do you wish to see some of your dear ones?" asked the gentleman confidingly.

Nobody spoke for so long that Shultz finally said, "Yes."

"Well," said the gentleman, "will you kindly, each one of you, write the names of those you know in the spirit-world on one side of one of these slips and your own name on the other? We shall endeavor to get in touch with some of your friends."

The gentleman handed each one of the three a slip of paper. Shultz and Smaltz wrote several names, but Holtz did not move.

"Here, Holtz, I'll fix yours for you," said Smaltz, taking the paper from his hand. He wrote one name on eaeh side of the slip. One was that of Holtz, and under it he put "Investigator." Under the name on the other side he wrote, "Beloved Mother-in-law." Quickly Smaltz took the slip from Shultz and handed all three to the gentleman.

"Just step this way, please," he said, and led them into the dimly lighted front room.

"Confound you, Smaltz," said Holtz in a stage whisper, "did you tell him about my mother-in-law? I told you to let her alone."

Smaltz stepped quickly into the room, where further conversation on the subject was impossible.

"Now, fellows," whispered Shultz, "I want you both to watch very carefully and very scientifically. I came here to investigate and I want to do it."

The pleasant gentleman who had so kindly attended to their entrance addressed those present.

"Ladies and gentlemen, we are going to try our best tonight to have some good messages and materializations. I hope you all will get something. First, I shall pass around the box for the admission fee, which I will say for the benefit of those who may not know is one dollar."

The gentleman nodded and another gentleman arose and passed around the room.

"Now, again for the benefit of those who are new to us and who may be a little skeptical," continued the gentleman, "I wish to give an opportunity for investigation of the cabinet and the room so as to leave no room for doubt regarding the genuineness of this seance. Now, ladies and gentlemen, please anyone who wishes come up and examine the cabinet and table or anything at all."

"That sounds fair," whispered Shultz.

"You'd better go," replied Smaltz.

"All right."

He arose and another man quickly followed. Together they made an examination of the room and returned to their chairs satisfied.

"Now we shall ask the medium to step into this cabinet and then turn out the lights."

The medium, a lady of some two hundred pounds, entered the cabinet. In a moment all was in total darkness and a death-like silence reigned for a while.

Suddenly a little bell tinkled overhead. Everybody looked up but at first saw nothing. Then a bright, white hand appeared and moved from place to place, the tinkle of the bell following it. Then the hand disappeared and all was silent as before.

"Ugh!" said Smaltz suddenly.

"What's the matter?" asked Shultz.

"A cold hand passed over my face."

A bright spot appeared on the floor in front of the cabinet and the name of Mary Jones was spoken. The owner of the name answered.

"This is the spirit of Anna," said the voice of the pleasant gentleman. "Does Mary Jones recognize her? Please speak quickly if you do and help the spirit to materialize"

"Yes, I recognize her," said Mary Jones, and the bright spot gradually assumed much greater proportions until it finally took the form of a young woman.

"Just look at that," whispered Shultz. "It must be a spirit. How could it be anything else?"

Anna approached Mary Jones and held a short conversation with her, then disappeared from whence she had come.

"What do you think of that?" asked Shultz. But Smaltz and Holtz said nothing.

"William," a voice was heard to say. The three men looked above them. There was a bright spot near the ceiling.

"William Holtz!"

Holtz started violently. "Great Scott, you've stirred her up," he said to Smaltz.

"Call her down, Holtzie, call her down," urged Shultz.

"I won't. I don't want her."

Shultz was not going to let such an opportunity slip. "Here," he said.

The spot gradually descended and gradually grew larger, until a woman stood before the three men.

"William, I am your mother-in-law," said the spirit.

"Well, I can't help it," said Holtz.

"I love you, dear William." she continued.

"Since when?" asked Holtz.

"Since I came into the spirit world. I have been close to you so many times but you didn't know it. I am sorry for anything I ever did to displease you. I will stay close to you and help you."

"You needn't mind botherin'," said Holtz. "You can go on back home now."

"Don't insult the lady," whispered Smaltz.

"Well, dear son, I shall go. I do not blame you for your cold reception, but your heart will soften. Good-by." The lady seemed to wrap her luminous draperies around her and disappear

More materializations took place and messages were given to the believers among the audience. Bells rang, musical instruments played and flowers floated through the air. Then the lights were turned on and the seance was declared at an end.

Holtz made a rush for the door and the other two closely followed.

"Say, Holtz, she did come, didn't she?" said Smaltz as soon as they had gotten outside.

"Shut up. Talk about your own mother-in-law."

"It was wonderful," said Shultz. "I'm glad you came in this morning and persuaded me to take you."

Holtz said nothing more. All the way home Shultz and Smaltz talked of the evening's experience, with more or less shivers running up and down their backs, but Holtz was dumb.

When they reached the end of the journey the three separated and started for their respective homes.

Holtz lived nearer to the car line than the others, consequently reached home first.

He opened the front door, gave a violent start and turned in the direction he had come as fast as his legs would carry him.

He overtook Shultz, who lived only a little farther in the other direction.

"What on earth is wrong?" asked Shultz "Have you seen her again?"

"No," panted Holtz, "but she or somebody has left a coffin inside my door."

"Come on, let's go see if I can see it," suggested the investigator.

Back they went. Shultz saw the coffin and backed into the street.

"You better come home with me. Maybe it won't be there in the morning," he said.

They went to Shultz's house. He opened the door and there upon the floor stood a black coffin. He and Holtz were quickly on their way to overtake Smaltz.

"You fellows are crazy," he said when they had told him the awful story. "You'se got spooks on the mind. Come on home with me."

They were near Smaltz's home and decided to spend the night with him.

"Holy Moses!" he exclaimed, "they've left me one, too!"

Holtz and Shultz ran down the street looking for a policeman and Smaltz followed close behind.

The officer returned with them to Smaltz's house. He lifted up the lid, and there lay an envelope addressed to Smaltz. He read the contents.

"Dear Smaltz:

"Am just retiring from business so am sending you and your two friends something you will probably all need some day.

"Faithfully yours,

"Planter."

The three friends looked at each other speechless for a moment.

"Well, anyway," said Shultz, "this don't affect Holtz's mother-in-law any."

"Ah, shut up!" said Holtz.

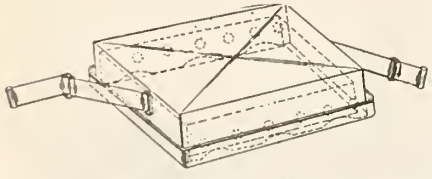
MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

IN the Patent Office it is the contention of Commissioner Moore that the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Butterworth v. United States, ex rel. Hoe et al. (112 U. S., 50), which made the decision of the Commissioner final within the office, thus doing away with appeals to the Secretary of the Interior, renders the connection of the Patent Office with the Interior department so slight that it would seem that its separation and establishment as an independent bureau is eminently desirable. Such a step would not only place the Patent Office upon a more stable footing with regard to the exercise of the powers of the Commissioner invested in him by law, but would relieve the Department of the Interior of the physical burden of caring for and appropriating for the bureau.

The establishment of the Patent Office as an independent bureau would be a step in the direction of progress in the interest of efficiency and economy. Its duties as an office are purely judicial in character, with such incidental clerical work as is necessary to carry them out. It requires in its employees special training along scientific and legal lines, and such employees are difficult to obtain and to retain in service, except at salaries higher than those paid to the other employees of the department, and the Patent Office has always suffered by reason of the failure of Congress to make the provision necessary. If good results are to be obtained, everything possible should be done to insure the independence, efficiency, and permanence of tenure of the entire force of the Patent Office. The Patent Office has nothing in common with the other bureaus of the Interior Department or of any other department.

Registration No 90,002 has been granted the Eastman Kodak Company, of Rochester, N. Y., for the trade-mark "ZELTA" for photographic paper, used since September 20, 1912.



Patent No. 1,048,444, issued to Charles Burdon Buxton, of Ormiston, Kiribilli, near Sydney, New South Wales, Australia, is for Daylight Photographic Plate Developing Apparatus, such as is used without a dark room. In the construction of apparatus of this class care must be taken to insure that it can be easily loaded by touch without risk of the plates being put into the wrong groove. As most fast plates now made are easily fogged by light coming through at so-called "safe-light" apertures, it is desirable to be able to load the apparatus easily by touch or feel alone, and thereby to use a dark bag which has no such "safe-light" apertures. When plates are loaded into grooves the apparatus should be such that they are secured against light rays while still in the bag and that the developing liquid itself may be contained in a vessel which does not require to be placed in the dark bag. It is further desirable that the apparatus be so made that the danger of freak marks occurring on the plates may be minimized as much as possible. As the developer acts more rapidly while in a state of agitation, as when moving across the plate in currents or streams, these freak marks result from such irregular flowings. Cleanliness being imperative in successful photography, it is important that all baffle plates, false bottoms and other parts of the apparatus be so constructed as to be readily adapted for washing. It is also desirable that such apparatus shall be so constructed as to be capable of developing any size plates up to the maximum measurement of the plate tray. The vessel for holding the developer must be watertight when closed; the method of closing must be simple, quick and safe, and the general appearance of the whole apparatus must be neat and as compact as possible. It is claimed that all these conditions and requirements are fulfilled in this apparatus.

FINALE. The act of Congress of July 31, 1912, prohibiting the importation of moving picture films depicting prize fights or boxing contests has been effective in consigning to the furnace some 7,500 feet of film pictures of the Johnson-Jeffries Reno "mill" of July 4, 1910, even though the films were made of American material, exposed and developed in this country. They were shipped to South America soon after the fight, the contract providing for their return, but when they arrived here after a tour of every city and village of Brazil, Argentina, Uruguay and Chili, the customs officers decided that they could not enter the country, and ordered that the films be "deported" even though native by production, upon which decree the owners suggested that the films be consigned to a hot place—even hotter than Brazil. So Appraiser Higgins ordered them where they ought to have gone in the first place—up the flue.

WITH regard to moving picture shows in Mexico, Consul Wilbert L. Bonney, writing from San Luis Potosi, has the following to say: "The motion picture business here, established eight years ago, has grown both in popularity and quality. Prior thereto the drama was for the wealthier classes only. The demand for pictures of artistic merit is recent. For example, Christmas week 'Les Miserables' films were shown, while the 'Inferno' and 'Aida' were recently exhibited.

"It is interesting to note the effect of these films upon the great number of people here who get their first introduction to fiction, drama, and art in this graphic manner. It is often difficult otherwise to know what the people think or what their preferences are. By simply throwing the picture of a prominent individual on the curtain the public preference is immediately and unmistakably demonstrated. Audiences here are demonstrative. Until the cheap motion pictures appeared it is probable that 80 per cent of the people had never witnessed a dramatic performance of any character.

"The future of the business here depends upon the development of the film business itself. Any improvements will be quickly taken up. The people are not much interested in views of their own country; even the battle of Bachimba did not draw well here They prefer French work and scenes. Bull-fight pictures do not take well. In fact, I am inclined to believe that the motion picture entertainments are encroaching upon the bull fights in public interest, but the recent failure of the latter may be due to other causes."

WE are indebted to the Golden State for an illustration of the possibilities of electrical utilization for the contraction of time and space in the administration of justice. While running his automobile through the town of Red Bluff, on his way to Chico, a man ran over and killed a dog. When he reached Chico he was met by the sheriff, who told him that he was wanted on the long-distance telephone from Red Bluff, where a warrant had been sworn out against him for exceeding the speed limit. After recovering from this electrical "shock" he pleaded guilty by 'phone and was fined $35.00, which he paid the sheriff. Had he been made to telegraph the fine the cycle of the "Electric Circuit Court" would have been complete. As it happened he was arrested, had his hearing, pleaded guilty to the charge and was fined, all without coming face to face with his accuser or judge. California has thus outstripped proverbial "Jersey Justice," and established an excellent precedent.

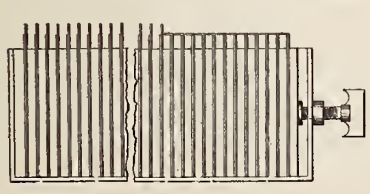
"Our colonies might be well enough," was a saying among Englishmen in 1774, "were it not for Dr. Franklin, who has with a brand lighted from the clouds set fire to all America."

The Elks, during a Lodge of Sorrow held recently at Seattle, utilized electricity in the memorial service in flashing the names of the departed members in big, bright letters as they were called off from the roll of dead. The effect was so impressive that the precedent will be observed in future years, and probably be adopted by other lodges throughout the country.

BILL TO AMEND THE MOVING PICTURE LAW.—Assemblyman Cuvillier and Senator Griffin introduced a bill to amend the penal law which forbids operators of moving picture shows to allow any children under 16 years of age to enter such places except with a parent or guardian. Assembly bill No. 27. The bill would amend that provision as follows:

"Except that any child under the age of 16 years may be admitted to a moving picture performance or theatre without a parent or guardian on week days, except Saturday, Sunday and school holidays between the hours of four o'clock and seven o'clock post-meridian, and on Saturdays, Sundays and school holidays between the hours of one o'clock post-meridian and seven o'clock post-meridian, provided in said theatre or at said moving picture performance, a separate space shall be set apart exclusively for children, and a matron, who shall not be less than twenty-five years of age, shall be in charge of said children. Said matron shall be employed by the theatre or moving picture establishment, only after she shall have satisfied the official that issued the license to said theatre or moving picture establishment of her fitness for said position, and obtained a certificate of approval of her employment as matron from said official. Said matron shall at all times thereafter, while so employed, be under the jurisdiction of the official that issued her the certificate of approval, and if during the employment of said matron the said official should have reason to believe that said matron is neglectful of her duty or incompetent, the said official shall issue a notice to the proprietor of said theatre or moving picture establishment withdrawing the said certificate of approval." To Codes Committee.

After considering the case for several weeks after argument, the Supreme Court of New York has rendered a decision restraining the Selig Company from selling, renting or exhibiting its production of Monte Cristo, on the ground that it is an infringement of the copyright version of the play owned by James O'Neill, the film production of which is controlled by the Famous Players' Film Company.



Patent No. 1,048,427, to Adolph Pettenkofer, of New York, N. Y., is for an Improved Method of Making Kinetoscope-Belts of the type wherein a plurality of separate picture leaves secured to a traveling band of belt are employed. The process consists in arranging a series of pictures, a plurality of spacing blocks, and a plurality of plates in a suitable frame, and in such manner that a spacing block and a plate will lie between each two successive pictures, and the ends of the pictures will extend beyond the corresponding ends of the plates; the combined thickness of said spacing blocks and plates being such that the pictures are spaced farther apart from one another than the width of the angularly bent strips hereinafter referred to; bending the projecting ends of the pictures about the ends of the plates as guides to thereby provide each picture with a strip extending at an angle to the remaining portion thereof; applying an adhesive substance to the exposed surfaces of said angular bent strips; and securing a band of flexible material to the coated surfaces of said strips.

GREAT SPORT AL FRESCO—Fish versus Hunt. 81 Ky. 584.

All things come to those who hustle while they wait, according to the modern interpretation of the old saw, and that waiting is sometimes the most tedious of employments is a fact fully realized by the officials in charge of the New Union Passenger Station at Kansas City who are about to eliminate the hustle from the wait by the installation of animated picture paraphernalia for the benefit of those waiting for trains, late or otherwise. Such an innovation for the entertainment of passengers ought to prove effective. It has already been adopted on the French line of ocean steamships, to the apparent delight of the sea-going public—the France, Provence and Touraine having been fully equipped in this respect.

Hamlet may have been designedly "non compos," but the prophetic spirit, nevertheless, inspired him to define the higher function of the motion picture art, i.e.:

"To hold, as 'twere, a mirror to Nature; to shew virtue her own feature, scorn her own image, and the very age and body of the time his form and pressure."

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of the Moving Picture News.

AMBROSIO FEATURE A BIG SUCCESS

"Satan," the feature film produced by the Ambrosio Company, is meeting with enormous success Congratulatory letters and telegrams by the score have been received by them.

The Imperial Feature Film Company, of Pittsburgh, has just written the Ambrosio Company, advising them of the big business they are doing and are asking for additional territory.

The Ambrosio Company have another big film which will be announced shortly.

Harry Warren, one of the leading church musical directors of New York City, who was for nineteen years, until 1905, organist at St. Bartholomew's, Madison avenue and Forty-fourth street, and later of the Church of the Ascension, Fifth avenue and Tenth street, has entered the moving picture field. His first appearance in the moving picture field will be made soon in Rochester, where he will play a large pipe organ especially designed for theatrical use. The organ, which cost $50,000, has been called a "pipe-orchestra."

THE LOST SON (Special Two Reel) (Feb. 17).—John and George Nolan are brothers. John, a young man of 22, while kind-hearted, is inclined to be wild and frequents the billiard rooms. George, aged 14, is quiet and devoted to his mother. One night John gets into a quarrel in the pool room, his antagonist knocks him down and John, seizing a billiard ball, hurls it at the man, who drops, apparently dead. John rushes home and tells his mother that he has killed a man. She implores him to make his escape, which he does by the back window just as the police raid the house. The shock of the tragedy affects the father so that he drops dead. John races to the depot, boards a freight train and is lost to the family. Ed Jennings, the wounded man, does not die, and John's mother advertises and instructs the police to find her boy, but to no purpose. John believes himself to be a murderer hunted by the law and dares not read a newspaper. George gets a position in a store. He is industrious, well liked and quickly promoted; his salary takes care of the little home, but the mother continues to grieve for the lost son. Ten years pass and George is appointed to a position of trust. He has to visit another city on business for the firm, and is entrusted with a quantity of money. There a fair and races going on, and he thinks it all right to take a day's enjoyment. In the crowd he is robbed or loses the wallet containing the firm's money. Terrified at the idea of what may be thought, he places the small amount of his own money on a horse, hoping to win back his loss. The horse loses and, in desperation, he returns to the bookie and begs him to accept his watch on another bet. The bookie laughs, but after much persuasion takes the watch and opens the case. It contains the picture of a woman. He seizes George and demands "Whose picture it is." George replies that it is his mother. "It is my mother also," replies the bookie. George tells him that Ed Jennings did not die. The two brothers return to the old home. The mother is overwhelmed with joy and John makes good his brother's loss.

THE CITY OF SAN FRANCISCO (Feb. 11).—In the views of this typical American city as shown in this picture we feel that the general public will take a special interest for several reasons, viz.: that it was at the time of the earthquake, in 1906, probably the most photographed city in the world; that as the pictures in 1906 showed the devastation wrought by the terrific upheaval, the present pictures show how the enterprise and undaunted spirit of the West have brought order out of chaos, rebuilt and erected palaces on the ruins and caused a new and beautiful city to rise phoenix-like from the ashes of the old and that it is now occupying a prominent place in the public's mind as being the site of the Panama Pacific Universal Exposition in 1915 to celebrate the opening of that marvel of engineering, the Panama Canal.

Among the many interesting views we see the officials of the Japanese government in conjunction with the officials of the Panama Exposition and municipal officials selecting the site and turning the first shovelful of earth for the Japanese exhibit at the exposition. Beautiful panoramic views of the residential portions of the city, close views of the business portion and of the numerous statues which are of national interest—charming bits from the public parks and drives—the famous Seal Rocks and Cliff House, in the large dining room of which we see the Japanese and exposition officials at luncheon. In addition to the many other interesting scenes which our limited space does not permit us to describe we see the famous Sutro baths, which are known the world over, interior views of which we were especially fortunate in obtaining, showing hundreds of bathers and spectators. We believe we have obtained the most complete and comprehensive motion pictures ever made of this wonderful feature of a wonderful city. This film should be full of interest both to those who have seen the city of San Francisco and to those who have not.

DANGER OF THE STREET (Feb. 12).—In this day when the interest of school directors and teachers is being centered increasingly on the motion picture as an educational factor, largely because of the lasting love and enthusiasm for the living lessons shown by the children themselves, no subject can appeal stronger than that of the prevention of the thousands of needless accidents that not only the child is exposed to under our high pressure living but the adult as well.

The busy public witnesses these accidents daily but rushes on into identical mishaps tomorrow because the lesson has not been brought home to them graphically—and it is the life saving, limb saving work of the motion picture that will vivify this simple but vital lesson. The Edison Company is the pioneer in this field as it was a leader in the safe and sane Fourth and the Pure Milk and Tuberculosis crusades. If a safe and sane Fourth saves hundreds of lives, a safe and sane everyday on the streets and highways of the cities and country towns will save thousands and prevent pain and suffering to tens of thousands of persons who would otherwise be thoughtless or ignorant of the dangers they face.

The Edison Company devoted several weeks to the making of this film, carrying out the ideas advocated by those interested in the accident prevention movement. The scenes were worked out from typical accidents that have occurred and are occurring every day and includes those where street cars, automobiles, games in the street, roller skating, bicycle riding, "stealing rides" on wagons and street cars and a number of other causes that contribute to the list of dead and injured children.

Quite apart from its educational value the picture is varied and interesting throughout.

AMERICAN

PECOS PETE IN SEARCH OF A WIFE (Feb. 13).—A cowboy from New Mexico concludes his only requirement to complete his earthly joys is the acquisition of a wife, so he veritably goes to market to seek his prize.

How large a variety he would have to select from he little dreamt, and once it became noised about that he was in quest of a mate, he soon had a peck of trouble on his hands. Possibly all would have been well had Pecos not taken it upon himself to offer unqualified encouragement to many, only to take the liberty of changing his mind. From Widow Cotts he switched to Singing Bird, an Indian girl, only to transfer to Dolores, a Mexican senorita.

The excitement grew in intensity from day to day and had its climax when Pecos run into a party of school teachers on a vacation trip.

The-experienced eye of Widow Cotts, however, gave her the upper hand and she soon had Pecos annexed to her sheep ranch, much to the disgust of Pete.

THE ROMANCE (Feb. 15).—A charming romance started by an innocently foolish act and carried to a successful climax.

At the Cliff Villa, Miss Brown and her maiden aunt were finding life anything but the beautiful pastime that the architectural and horticultural beauties bespoke for those fortunate enough in life to be able to command such comforts. On the contrary, things were growing so monotonous to Laura Brown that she sought for and found enjoyment in tantalizing her aunt, upon whom Dame Fortune had never smiled long enough to make her either attractive or wealthy.

When the scion of a wealthy family made his debut in the circle of acquaintance that forms the leading characters for this interesting portrayal, matters were not prospering as well as could be desired until idleness of mind led Miss Brown into mischief that led up to the unraveling of a beautiful romance.

Kerrigan takes the part of the idle, rich young swain, turns a new leaf, becomes industrious and, in the story, of course, becomes engaged to Miss Van Trump, the winsome ingenue lead.

LUX

LEOPOLD AND THE LEOPARD (Feb. 14).—Leo is one of the lads that adorn the promenade at Southend. He sees a pretty girl, and promptly follows her home. Mary resents his intrusions, but he is so persistent that she determines to give him a lesson which he is not likely to forget. She promises to marry him if he will carry a note to a friend of hers and bring back to her whatever may be given to him. The letter is to her fiance and instructs him to send back by bearer his pet leopard.

Leo is somewhat alarmed by the ferocity of his charge, but sticks valiantly with the beast. The leopard goes for poor Leo and gives him a very warm time, and, after passing through as much excitement in about five minutes as the ordinary individual meets with in a lifetime, poor Leo is obliged to emulate the example of Charlie's aunt—he is still running.

On the same reel:

A MODERN ARCHITECT.—This film contains many good tricks of the camera which never fail to make a comic popular. At the same time Arabella, the Lux comedienne, in the leading rôle creates much fun. Having decided to build a house after her own ideas of house building, she draws up her plans and sets to work. The workmen do not hurry sufficiently to suit her ladyship and she makes them work at a very high speed. Finally her house is finished in a downright jerry-built fashion, and it does not prove capable of containing the crowd of guests whom Arabella invites to attend the housewarming. The house collapses under its burden and causes the guests to receive many hard knocks, which they do not omit to return to the unfortunate architect with interest.

CINES

FOR MOTHER'S SAKE (Feb. 11).—Marie, a modest young milliner's apprentice, is devoted to her mother, and is always trying to make her happy, but, at the same time, reserves a place in her affections for her sweetheart, Alfred. Her future looms bright with prospective happiness until one day her mother is suddenly taken seriously ill.

Poverty makes it impossible for Marie to provide the essential comforts and medical attention, but she is too proud to let Alfred know, who, unable to account for her changed attitude, terminates their engagement. Driven to despair in the face of these discouragements, Marie goes to some of her wealthier friends in search of help, but no one will listen to her plea.

At last she calls upon Alfred, who insists upon taking her to dinner. Suddenly in the midst of their conversation she has a presentiment that her mother is in great distress, and in a burst of tears reveals her secret. Alfred now understands all of her recent behavior toward him and the two hurry home to care for the suffering mother, who with the proper attention soon regains her health, and rejoices over the restored happiness of the two young people.

THANHOUSER

A MYSTERY OF WALL STREET (Feb. 11).—A great financier, a power in Wall Street, fell in love with a beautiful society girl. Feeling sure that she would accept him, he proposed, but she had the bad taste to prefer a younger and poorer man, and the financier, filled with rage and chagrin, determined to be revenged.

The girl's father was a broker in Wall Street, and it was at him that the financier struck. In the daily battles on the Stock Exchange the shares in which the broker was interested steadily sank in value. The broker, on the verge of ruin, learned who his enemy was, and asked him to spare him. The financier laughed at him and said that he meant to ruin him. And he certainly would have kept his word if the successful suitor had not intervened.

The young man told his future father-in-law not to worry, but on the following morning to lead a determined onslaught upon the financier's holdings, for the latter, he assured the worried broker, would not be on hand to lead his forces.

By a clever ruse, the financier was decoyed away from bis home, and he did not return to New York until the market had closed for the day. The silent ticker in his office told its own story. During his absence the girl's father had recouped his losses, while the financier had lost heavily.

Why the financier happened to be absent at such a critical time is one of the mysteries of Wall Street. A few venturesome people have asked this question of bim, but all they received was a fierce glare and a snappish, "None of your business." The broker, too, is silent, but when the matter is discussed in the presence of his son-in-law, a suspicious twinkle comes into the young man's eyes.

SOME FOOLS THERE WERE (Feb. 14).—A very pretty girl came to the summer resort hotel. Three bachelors, who had been idling away their time at the resort, brightened up perceptibly, and laid plans to make her acquaintance. But unfortunately the girl chanced to pass as they were discussing the details and overheard them.

The first man "sprained" his ankle. The girl and her aunt helped him tenderly to the hotel. The "sprain" ceased as soon as the two women left bim. The second man "accidentally" hit the aunt in the back while golfing. He was a good golfer and the ball struck her where he had intended it should, right between the shoulder blades. He profusely apologized and was forgiven, incidentally making the girl's acquaintance. The third man, older than the others, and a finished prevaricator, informed the girl that he knew her father. She did not ask any embarrassing questions, but charmed him by the confiding way she accepted his statement.

There was intense rivalry among the bachelors, but the girl seemed to like all of them. She delighted in posing them in odd attitudes while she snapped them with her little kodak, telling them how "funny" they looked.

The day came when the belle had to leave. The three bachelors sadly bade farewell, but she assured them that they would hear from her soon. They did! For the evening's newspaper contained a picture of the fair enchantress, who, it seemed, had been stopping at the hotel under an assumed name. She was really a well-known writer, who had been collecting data and photographs for a magazine article on "Fools One Meets at Summer Resorts."

The bachelors were stunned. They remembered the cute little snapshots the girl had taken of them, and realized that they would look "funny" (as the girl expressed) in a magazine article. They had been very sentimental and foolish, they all recalled, and there was no doubt that they had furnished much material to the young authoress.

But they had been taught a salutary lesson. They never flirted again, for they all agreed that it isn't safe.

FROM BUD TO BLOSSOM.—The actual growth of flowers shown by speed magnification.

Single photographs are recorded on the film at brief intervals during the period of the opening of a bud, and these, when projected upon the screen at the usual speed, show in a few moments all the changes that have taken place in the developing flower for several hours past. One of the most striking things noticed is the effort that the plant appears to be making as it opens its buds. Leaves and stem move in sympathy and it seems as though the plant was making a mighty effort to realize the principal aim of its existence.

The varieties shown are—yellow iris, sweet sultan, single carnation, pink gypsy glass, gladiolus, pelargoniums, nasturtiums, roses, butterfly flowers and Japanese tiger lily.

ENTERTAINING AUNTIE.—Auntie writes to her nephew at college that she is paying too many bills for him and proposes to come on and investigate. His college mates learn of the proposed visit and one of them disguises himself as Auntie. The nephew learns their plans and when the real Auntie arrives, presumes she is the made-up college mate and treats the old lady accordingly, with the consequence she stops paying any bills whatever and the nephew goes to work as a shipping clerk and the old lady devotes herself and her money to the Abigail Jones Home for Dogs. At the conclusion of the reel contrasting scenes are shown, presenting the nephew as shipping clerk, with perspiration streaming from his rather dirty face, and some of Auntie's pet dogs lying on cushions in the Abigail Jones Home for Dogs.

GAUMONT

CATCHING THE "BIG SNEEZE" (Feb. 13).—Jimmy, his little brother Tim, and bis mother go strolling. As they pass a lonely place a man stops in front of them and throws pepper into the mother's eyes and nose and snatches her purse. He runs away, leaving her to cry and sneeze to her heart's content, and even more so. The two little boys guide the blinded mother home. After she has had her eyes bathed, they show her an article in the newspaper which reads: "Purse snatchers have been very audacious. They ply their nefarious trade in broad daylight and at night outside of the brilliantly lighted cafes. They first blind their victims with pepper."

The following night Jimmy and Tiny Tim, awfully, awfully angry that their mother has been so horridly treated by the naughty, naughty thief, decide that they will "get" this "Big Sneeze." They dress up in some of their father's old clothes. The garments are many times too large for them. They take with them a large banjo and another instrument. They are disguised as street musicians in order to gain admission to the big cafes where they hope to catch "Big Sneeze." They enter the "Pink Mouse" cafe. They notice a man taking pepper from the table and putting it in a handkerchief. He resembles the man who had attacked their mother. They edge nearer to him and Jimmy notices a bulge in his back pocket. He believes and hopes it to be stolen jewels. Jimmy puts his hand in the pocket and draws out his mother's stolen jewels. With the other hand he throws pepper into the nose and eyes of the "Big Sneeze," whom it really was. The boys denounce him as he who had robbed their mother. The "Big Sneeze" is arrested. Meanwhile, at the home of the boys, a servant has entered their room. She finds it vacant. In alarm she informs the mother, who is also agitated. At that moment, however, the two boys enter, Jimmy carrying the recovered jewels. They are happily received.

VITAGRAPH

THE WEAPON (Feb. 13).—With a preference for Frank Lewis, Mr. Grey, an eccentric old man, who has a passion for collecting precious gems, disapproves of his niece's lover, Darrel Young. He is incensed at Dorothy's refusal to marry Lewis and threatens to disinherit her in his will. Dorkins, the butler, observes Mr. Grey's antipathy for Darrel Young, and determines to take advantage of it in his purpose to rob his employer of his jewels. He sees the old man admiringly looking over his precious possessions and he casts furtive and greedy glances towards them. While Mr. Grey is thus engaged, Darrel enters the library and Grey puts the jewels in his desk. Darrel frankly asks Mr. Grey's consent to his marriage to Dorothy. The old man becomes very angry and threatens to strike Darrel, who defends himself by raising his hand as if to strike the old gentleman. While in this aggressive attitude, a maid in one of the adjoining rooms sees Darrel's hand raised and she hastily withdraws to inform her fellow-workers of what she witnessed. Darrel lowers his hand without striking Mr. Grey and indignantly withdraws.

The butler has been watching the scene and immediately after the young man has gone, he enters the room and seizes the jewels. Mr. Grey resists him and Dorkins, grasping a sharp paper knife from the table, stabs the old man to death. Then he hastens to tell the other servants that he found his employer dead in the library. The police are notified, and come to the house; suspicion, through the testimony of the maid, is fastened upon Darrel Young. Dorothy, hearing the maid's evidence, falls in a faint and is caught by the butler. The point of the knife which the butler hurriedly placed in the inside pocket of his coat penetrates Dorothy's shoulder, and she utters a scream of pain, pointing towards the butler. The detectives seize him, tear open his coat and discover the blood-stained knife in his pocket, and the murder of Mr. Grey is fastened upon him. He is arrested and Darrel's innocence is established.

IMP

AN IMP ROMANCE (Feb. 10).—George Barr and Howard Sloane, two young sculptors, are contenders in a prize contest for the most artistic statue to be finished and presented at the art school within the month. Neither one has sufficient capital to employ a model, but together they start out to find someone who will pose for the statue and take a chance on getting paid. They accidentally come upon a company of moving picture actors who are rehearsing a scene. In the company is Violet Horner, the beautiful leading lady. In her the boys see a wonderful subject for the statue. They make her acquaintance and, after telling her the situation, prevail upon her to pose for them. During the sitting both boys fall in love with her but she cannot decide which one she likes best. Barr's statue turns out the best. Sloane realizes this and one afternoon while the studio is locked and the statues covered. Sloane sneaks in and, without removing the cover, smashes the statue which he thinks is Barr's (but the maid in cleaning up has changed the position of the statues and Sloane, unknowingly, has smashed his own). Sloane's perfidy is not discovered until the day of the contest.

Violet, while in the studio looking over some picture films, comes upon a piece that was taken by one of the Imp cameramen on the afternoon that Sloane smashed the statue. She telephones to the hall where the contest is being decided and requests the judges to delay their decision until she arrives. Jumping into an auto Violet is driven to the scene of the contest. Sloane is denounced and Barr is awarded the prize. Violet accepts Barr's offer to pilot her through life.

FRONTIER

THE GIRL OF THE RANGE (Feb. 19).—Very few people there are in this busy world of ours, even in the heart of the typical Western range country where cattle rustling has in the past and even is now carried on extensively, who really know how desperate the undertaking is. The stealing of cattle by the daredevil renegade necessitated in many parts of the rugged frontier the establishing of small bands of rangers, whose duty it is to capture, dead or alive, the said desperate rustlers when caught in the act, or when positive proof was sufficient to warrant tracking them to their lair. Our little story deals with the characters of the days of the '60s when cattle rustling was carried on in disregard of the laws, and of the hardy ranger scouts who, like bloodhounds, were ever anxious for the scent that would lead them to a desperate battle with the cattle thieves. Their operations became so extensive that Capt. Chas. Barnes, a noted ranger of undisputed courage, was sent to Arizona to break up the rustling, his wife and son going with him. Shortly after reaching Arizona the sweetheart of Bruce Barnes, son of Capt. Barnes, regardless of the warning that the rustlers were active, decided she must visit her sweetheart. The journey is made with safety, but she finds when reaching her destination that Bruce, for some reason, is not the same. As our story progresses we will find the reason. A short time after the arrival of Rosaline at the office of Capt. Barnes, he receives notice that a gang of rustlers are working a short distance away. One of his scouts is sent out. He comes back badly wounded, reporting that the rustlers are in force. Hurried preparations are made to corral the band, and Capt. Barnes and his rangers ride rapidly away toward the scene of action. Rosaline cares for the wounded ranger and while assisting him, Bruce, her sweetheart, comes in. She supposed Bruce was with her father, and asks him the reason why. He evades her answer and refuses her caresses, leaving her. Rosaline decides to find out the reason, and as Bruce rides away, she mounts the horse of the wounded ranger and follows him at a safe distance. She sees him meet, as she shortly learns afterwards, May, the daughter of the boss rustler. Realizing Bruce has been false to her, she awaits her opportunity, returns her engagement ring, tells him to stick by the little girl whom he has promised many things, and that she will go out of his life completely. Later there are constant skirmishes between the rangers and the rustlers, and in one of these battles the boss rustler is wounded unto death. Bruce, because of his love for May, decides to turn traitor to his father's cause, and just before May's father dies, Bruce promises the dying man that he will lead the rustlers on to victory. The rapidly changing scenes bring complications, and at last fate brings the rangers and cattle rustlers together in a last hand-to-hand battle that is to decide the fortunes of war. May, the daughter of the rustler, in her anxiety for Bruce, insists upon riding at his side. A stray bullet, as though aimed by the hand of fate, finds lodgment in her frail body and the brave, troubled spirit passes through the portals of that great beyond where judgment is all beautiful. The horrible situation appalls the rustlers and they are easily overpowered. Capt. Barnes is wounded, and as Bruce, his son, now a captive, is brought before him, he learns for the first time that he is a traitor. Bruce, filled with remorse, begs his father to send him to prison, and tells him that only in that punishment can he find relief for his tortured soul. The sentence is passed by the father, and the boy is led away, while the head of the brave soldier sinks upon his breast. Time passes, and the penalty has been paid. The prison doors open and Bruce Barnes is met at the portals of liberty by Rosaline, who has found it impossible to forget him and still loves the man to whom long ago she pledged her troth. A little later on there is a comparatively happy reunion at the Barnes home, and we leave them to start a new, a better and happier life.

TWO SIDES TO A STORY (Feb. 21).—The barber is reading. It is the slack time of the day and he fills it in with reading the paper. The customer comes in silently. He lies back in the comfortable chair before the barber sees him. The towel is arranged around the customer's neck and the razor is sharpened when the barber starts back and his face assumes a look of hatred, mixed with a desire for revenge. As he shaves his customer, he tells him a story with concentrated venom and bitterness. He describes "how he was once a happy man, devoted to his wife, and loved, as he thought, by her. One day he left her in the morning after the usual affectionate leave-taking. Arriving at the shop he found he had forgotten the key. He returned and, as he approached the house, he saw through the window a stranger embracing his wife with warmth and enticing her with nuggets of gold. It was evident this was no chance meeting and that their familiarity was nothing new. Broken-hearted and discouraged he went away from his home and left the woman who had deceived him."

The tale finished, the customer looks bored until he catches the look of murder in the barber's eye as he cries, "and you are the man." There is a desperate struggle for the razor and, holding the barber's hand, the customer forces him to hear his side of the story.

The customer tells the barber "how he left the barber's wife, long ago, standing forlornly at the station as he went forth to carve out a fortune in the gold fields. Success came, and he returned and looked her up and, finding her, he clasped her in his arms and showed her the nuggets."

The barber, insane at this confession, endeavors to get the razor free when the customer cries, "The woman—your wife—is my sister," and the razor drops to the floor.

The two men return to the sorrowing wife and the barber returns to his old happiness once more.

THAT OTHER GIRL (Feb. 23).—Chester and Harold are admirers of Pearl. She favors Chester. He is visiting her one day and is just about to leave when Harold arrives. Chester drops a letter out of his pocket and Harold sees it. The letter mentions a certain Belle Archer, and Harold leaves it where Pearl is sure to see it. This she does, and immediately becomes angry at Chester. He calls again, but she telephones Harold while he is there and Chester leaves in a fury. The next day Chester is on his way to the armory with his gun. He meets Harold and immediately chases him. Harold is afraid that he will be shot and rushes home. Chester meanwhile cannot understand Pearl's actions and determines to call on her again. He does so, and, demanding an explanation, Pearl shows him the letter that she found. He laughs and shows her another letter which explains that Belle Archer is a race horse that he was backing and that she had won her race. Pearl immediately comprehends and she and Chester renew old ties, leaving Harold out of all consideration.

On the same reel:

SCHULTZ'S LOTTERY TICKET.—Schultz is an artist. He purchases a lottery ticket from his friend, Holtz. This he puts in his coat. Mrs. Schultz decides to buy her husband a new coat for his birthday. This she does and gives the old one to a dealer in old clothes who passed the door. Schultz's friend informs him that his ticket had won the prize of $5,000. Schultz immediately takes his friends and proceeds to celebrate. Upon arriving home, ten minutes after his wife has given his coat away, he begins to look for the ticket but cannot find it. His wife explains and he immediately sets out to find the man with his coat. After numerous false clues he runs across the man, and the man runs away. He throws the coat over a fence when he sees that he cannot escape and Schultz gets hold of it just as some boys were throwing it on a bonfire. He saves the coat and is pleased to find the precious ticket safe. He rushes home and is mortified when his wife informs him that his friend again called and left a note explaining that the ticket was a counterfeit and that Schultz's hopes were all in vain.

NESTOR

THE HARVEST (Feb. 19).—Mary has two admirers, John and Hal, but while her father and mother approve of John, Mary selects Hal, marries him and moves to another state, where, after staking out a claim, both start to work it. Mary is injured by an explosion at the mine, and Hal writes her parents to come. In the meanwhile, he has met a dance hall girl, Cally, and as the accident has blinded his wife, he makes love to "the woman who don't care" in her presence. Doctor Scott performs an operation on Mary's eyes and after removing the bandages, lifts the shade, but the first thing the wife's eyes fall upon is her husband with Cally in his arms. It is the last straw; for months she has been made to realize how thoroughly worthless a man she has married in preference to the nobler John. Cally and Hal elope, but the horse runs away, instantly killing the woman, and Hal soon follows her. However, Mary is not left alone, for her parents arrive and with them is John, who has come to offer what aid is in his power, and to later take his place beside the woman he loves and who now loves him.

THE SONG OF THE TELEGRAPH (Two Reel) (Feb. 16).—The line of civilization is gradually crawling westward, steadily driving the red man further west or on the growing reservations. Lieut. Richards is in charge of the engineering corps which is running the telegraph line across the desert.

Many of the Indians have never seen the poles and the wires before and are afraid of the "strings which sing." Little Mona is not afraid, but she is very curious and wonders what weird song the wires sing. She tiptoes cautiously to the pole, puts her ear against it and listens entranced at the musical hum. Lieut. Richards watches her with cynical amusement. She makes such a pretty picture. He accosts her. She is much interested in the good-looking, kind, white man. He sees her again and again and amuses himself with her artlessness. She, poor child, falls in love with him and gives him a pretty string of beads. Her head and heart are so full of this engaging stranger that she no longer listens to the young brave, Choco, and he grows suspicious and watches.

A dispatch is sent to Richards from headquarters, telling him to use every precaution to avoid trouble with the unrestful Indians. He warns his men. Richards meets Mona near a telegraph pole and takes her in his arms and kisses her. He tells her that the wires are singing to her "I love you, I love you," and that they will always tell her the same sweet story. She, poor child, believes him. Choco hears and sees it all and, going to his chief, tells him. The chief orders Mona to stay in the camp and to keep away from the pale face. She rebels.

One day an Indian tries to steal a gun and belt. A trooper fires at him and wounds him. He escapes to his tribe and the Indians jump at the excuse to start a fight. Mona divines their intentions and runs away and tells her lover of the uprising.

The Indians surprise the advance body of engineers and massacre them. They tie the body of one man on a horse with an arrow still in him, and set it loose. The horse reaches the cavalry camp. The Captain, doubting his ability to cope with the Indians, sends a man out to climb the nearest telegraph pole and send a message for help. The man is seen by the Indians but manages to climb the pole and is able to send part of the message before a bullet finds its billet in his body and he falls.

The unfinished message tells enough of the awful tale to enable the Commander to know where to send reinforcements, and they start for the scene of unrest. Lieut. Richards and his party are hemmed in at Elks Horn. They suffer from thirst and Richards offers to go and try to break through the Indians and get water. Mona, from a hillside, sees his brave action and steals away and joins him and helps him get the water. He suffers a temporary collapse. She revives him and helps him on his way back. He gets through and the water is passed around to the suffering men. The cavalry arrives and relieves the gallant little band. Mona helps to nurse the Lieutenant, but as he recovers he gets tired of her attentions and his one desire is to get East. He is promoted and granted a three months' leave of absence.

Choco escapes and determines upon a terrible revenge. He gets his bow and arrows and stealthily awaits his chance to kill Richards for stealing Mona from him, for he knows the Lieutenant is not in earnest. The time for Richards' departure arrives and he gets his belongings together. Mona, with a premonition of disaster, will not leave him and he looks around for an excuse to get away from her. He gets her to sit by the telegraph pole and listen to the love song and promises to return very soon. He puts his coat over her shoulders and his hat on her head and leaves her so.

Choco steals up, sees what he believes to be the accursed white face and a quivering arrow pierces the trusting girl's breast. He runs up to gloat over his rival's suffering and is griefstricken at what he finds.

Lieut. Richards forgets all about his flirtation with the Indian maiden as he clasps the "girl he left behind him" in his arms and Choco stands immobile, with the grief eating his faithful heart out by the grave of little Mona in the solitary desert.

BILLY'S STRATEGY (Feb. 18).—Billy and his sweetheart have had a little quarrel, and just to make him jealous she accepts the attentions of another suitor. When she thinks she has punished Billy enough she decides to break her engagement with Billy's rival and to again accept Billy's attentions, but before doing so she requests Billy's rival to return to her the letters that she had written to him during their short courtship, which he absolutely refuses to do. He informs her that he is going to Europe, and that when he returns he will amuse the boys at the club, with the letters. In desperation she informs Billy of his rival's intention and informs him that she cannot accept his offer of marriage while his rival retains those letters. On Billy learning that his rival, whom he has never met, is about to sail for Europe, he decides to burglarize the house and get his sweetheart's letters, but, unfortunately for Billy, his rival misses the boat and returns in time to catch Bill robbing the house. Not knowing Billy and thinking that he is a burglar, he phones for the police. He then confronts Bill, who in turn thinks the rival has gone to Europe, mistakes him for a burglar and, when the police arrive, Bill has him arrested but as they are taking him away, the butler, whom Bill has robbed of the keys so that he could enter the house, arrives with a policeman and identifies the rightful owner; they then return to the house to arrest Bill, who, after many trying situations, succeeds in getting out of the house with the much-coveted letters, returning them to his sweetheart, who in turn accepts his proposal.

ESSANAY

THE GIRL IN THE CASE (Feb. 12).—Jim Rice, a traveling man, meets an old friend of his nicknamed "Old Geaser" in a hotel lobby. With Rice is Virginia Grant, an actress with a musical comedy show. Old Geaser is introduced to Miss Grant. Rice is called to the telephone. During his absence Old Geaser takes Miss Grant to her theatre. Miss Grant suggests that Old Geaser go out and buy some cold lobster and champagne and bring them back to her dressing room. Geaser departs for the hotel, where he orders the desired luxuries. In the meantime Rice has been informed that Old Geaser has taken his girl. He tells two or three of the traveling men around the hotel that he will get even. The waiter wraps up the lobster and champagne and sets it on a table just outside the dining room door. Rice sees the bundle and, noticing Old Geaser's name on it, substitutes it for another package. Geaser takes the package to his new acquaintance of the stage. Miss Grant invites her brother and a friend to dine with Geaser and herself. The package is opened and an old pair of shoes fall out. Geaser is thrown out of the theatre. The following day Old Geaser's niece Ruth arrives. Jim Rice is very much smitten with her. Ruth informs Mr. Rice that it will be impossible for him to continue his acquaintance with her until he gets her uncle's consent. Old Geaser refuses emphatically. A week later Old Geaser visits Miss Grant at the theatre and promises her a diamond ring if she will promise to love him. Of course the young actress consents. Rice, suspicious of where Old Geaser was going, follows him. He bribes the passing policeman to arrest Old Geaser as a suspicious character. The officer is about to take Geaser to headquarters when Rice interferes, tells Old Geaser that he will "fix it" with the policeman if he'll consent to the marriage of his niece. The uncle consents. The two men return to the hotel. A note is handed Old Geaser which states that his niece has eloped with Miss Grant's brother. Miss Grant appears on the scene and returns the ring to Old Geaser, saying that she could never learn to love him. Both men are overwhelmed.

ECLAIR

THE TRAIL OF THE SILVER FOX (Feb. 11).—"Right purty thing, ain't it. Guess I'll just take that myself."

Bang! Crash!

The big, burly body of Yellowstone Dan went tumbling through a pile of overturned chairs, as he staggered backward and fell with a thud—dead!

Instantly all was in an uproar. The crowd in the Golden Nugget rushed to the corner, where lay the body of the six-foot ruffian, to find pretty Therese Bertila, almost fainting, and Clancy Marr, her lover, bending over Dan, picking up the big revolver.

Therese wore the beautiful White Fox pelt, of which she was so proud, since it was a gift from Clancy, and several could just place big Dan's last remark about that "right purty thing." No one had noticed little Fawn Afraid, the Cree girl, who had slipped away in the first confusion.

Sergeant Jack Daniels, R. M. P., could see but one answer. Marr was arrested and little Therese walked slowly to her cabin, hardly able to realize what had happened.

But Fawn Afraid followed, and at once she tells the heart-broken girl that it was she, not Clancy, who had killed big Dan, and for most justifiable reasons. Overjoyed at this, the belle of the little Yukon settlement hurried to headquarters to tell the officers, but she had hardly returned to her cabin, when Clancy staggered in, saying he had escaped from his captor, whom he imagined to be his rival. He had left him at the bottom of a ravine with a broken thigh.

"What!" almost screamed the startled girl. "You left him there, crippled to die in the cold!"

She rushed from the cabin and out through the cold, bitter night to search for the injured officer. Therese plodded through the woods, half-guessing at the trail, in the falling snow, until at last, in the morning, she found Daniels, almost dead from exposure. The troopers were notified and the injured sergeant was moved to Therese's cabin.

Meanwhile, it was learned that Yellowstone Dan was an outlaw, with a large reward offered for his capture, dead or alive. Fawn Afraid collects the reward and leaves it on Therese's table as compensation for the trouble she has caused her.

As Therese nurses the wounded man back to health, Clancy learns a wholesome lesson and is cured of his groundless jealousy. When the sergeant leaves to return to his barracks, Therese gives him the beautiful white fox pelt to point the lesson for Clancy.

A LARGE EVENING (Feb. 13).—"Awfully busy to-day, hardly had time for lunch. Missed two cars to-night, that's what made me so late. I'm just all in. Can hardly keep awake. You look tired out, too, Laura."

"Well, I think you are late! You're right about me though, dear, I am tired out. I spent most of the day shopping and I'm so sleepy. I think the best thing we can do is to retire early to-night.

Neither of them meant what they said. They were far from feeling sleepy. In fact, Mr. Jones was thinking of the fellows at the Minx Club, wishing he was there at that very minute, and Mrs. Jones was planning a cunning scheme of how she would get to a certain dance which one of her friends was giving that evening. They were sitting in the dining-room, while Mr. Jones was eating his half-cold dinner, which had been kept for him nearly two hours. But his mind wasn't on the dinner. While Mrs. Jones was waiting for her husband to return from business, two letters were delivered. One was for her from a friend of hers, who was giving a dance that evening, saying that she would like very much for her to come, even though Mr. Jones couldn't accompany her. The other was for Mr. Jones, from the Minx Club, telling him that he is expected there that evening for a big game. What were they going to do? Mrs. Jones is exceedingly provoked at her husband's late return. He pacifies her with $100, which she puts in the drawer of the sideboard for the time being.

They both go to their rooms after dinner. Wifey gets out a ball dress, and hubby thinks he will find out whether his wife has really gone to bed, so he puts on his pajamas over his street clothes, and goes to his wife's room. She is all dressed for the ball and hurriedly dons kimona and cap, and allows hubby to come in. Tbey both yawn and say good night again. Each of them then hurries to get out, and hubby goes to his gambling and wifey to the dance. During the evening Mr. Jones loses all his money and even an I. O. U. for $100. Mrs. Jones enjoys the ball and there meets an old flame. At 1:30 a. m. she leaves and is escorted home by the former admirer.

Meanwhile, hubby has arrived home, thought of the $100 in the sideboard, and is about to take it when he thinks he bad better disguise himself as a burglar. Wifey arrives home, and, just as she is getting ready to disrobe, she hears a noise downstairs, takes her umbrella, and goes down to the dining-rom, where she finds the burglar. The old flame, meanwhile, is outside, and sees what is going on. At seeing the burglar, Mrs. Jones rushes upstairs for hubby and finds him not there. Being suspicious, she takes a revolver and returns to the dining-room and leads her husband a merry dance. The flame, thinking himself a hero, hurries in to aid Mrs. Jones, only to be faced by the husband, who orders him to get out, which he promptly does by the window. The husband and wife stare at each other. Both promise to be good and they decide to bury tbe hatchet.

URBAN-ECLIPSE—GEORGE CINES

A BUSINESS SHARK (Feb. 12).—Financial difficultics force Vernon, a banker, to ask his friend, Meyers, for a loan of $50,000. Meyers, who has a great admiration for Mrs. Vernon, gladly lends the money, believing it will gain him favor in her eyes. However, later, his advances are repulsed by her with scorn, and to get revenge he demands payment on the notes at the first opportunity. To save her husband, Mrs. Vernon pawns her priceless pearl necklace, replacing it with an imitation string.

A short time afterward, the Okasa Oil shares, in which Vernon is heavily interested, are announced to be rising. Vernon telephones his brokers to increase his holdings. Meyers, in the meantime, hearing of his friend's good fortune, determines to ruin him, and sends a forged telegram ordering Vernon's brokers to sell the Okasa shares at once.

That evening Meyers attends the Vernons' ball and, while dancing with Mrs. Vernon, notices that her pearls are false. Suspecting what has happened, he angrily breaks the string, scattering the heads upon the floor. Mrs. Vernon informs her husband of the insult and, reminding him of the forged telegram which they have just received, points with a finger of suspicion at Meyers. Unable to conceal his fury Vernon vehemently orders the scoundrel to leave the house at once, while Mrs. Vernon seeks consolation in her husband's arms.

GREAT WESTERN

FATHER AND SON (Feb. 15).—This drama deals for the most part with the ingratitude of a son who had gained promotion in the army and found himself outranking his father. The latter is a sergeant and has seen long service on the field of battle, but for some reason or other the son, who has been promoted to a lieutenancy, requests his father to retire so that he will not be humiliated by serving under his son. The father, on the other hand, takes it as an honor to serve under his offspring, but the latter still persists in his determination that the father must retire or seek other quarters. The broken-hearted old man finally decides to present his resignation to the colonel in command, but as a war is imminent, the veteran is urged to remain and go to the front in the cause of his country. He consents and covers himself with glory in many encounters, but on one occasion, during a review of the officers, the son, who is in command of a detachment of which his father is a member, deliberately fails to salute him when the officers are being congratulated for the valor. The old man's heart is almost broken and in the next encounter he pushes himself into the vanguard and not only saves his son's life but saves the day. During the battle he is cut down by a cavalryman in the ranks of the enemy and dies on the field of battle. His son is at his side and when the body is carried to the field hospital the commanding colonel orders that unusual dignities be shown. The son stands abashed at the side of the army stretcher and finally arises to uncover and show reverence to the body of the father whom he had urged to retire from the service.

On the same reel is a series of Danish landscape scenes showing interesting marine views of the coast of Jutland.

MAJESTIC

TEACHER WANTED (Feb. 9).—Mary, the pride of her father's heart and the adored of all the cowboys of the ranch, is as good a shot as any of them. Her father decides she must go East to school as she is growing up too wildly. So despite her protests and the boys' pleading, off she goes. Her father dies in the years that follow and when she is twenty she finds herself all alone in the world. In her Massachusetts school she receives an offer to come to Colorado and take charge of a little schoolhouse there. She accepts. Once out there, the boys think her a Boston schoolmarm and decide to play all sorts of tricks on her. Three of them enroll themselves as her scholars and do everything in their power to make the children laugh. Seeing that she cannot maintain order by kindness she resolves to use other methods. Next day she has her big sharpshooter hidden in her frock. When the first cowboy shows signs of foolishness she takes out her gun and bids him recite "Mary had a little lamb." He refuses; she plants a bullet in the ground right under his feet; before he realizes it he is reciting for all he is worth. His companions outside the windows are enjoying the joke as much as the little teacher. She submits all three of the boys to this same treatment, making them sing, dance, draw on the blackboard by reason of her skilful handling of the big gun. This action on her part so wins their respect that before the week is out she has a dozen suitors and before the end of the month she has accepted one, and once more the "Teacher Wanted" sign hangs on the schoolhouse door.

THE WINNER LOSES (Feb. 11).—Dick Downing, a lovable chap, is an inveterate gambler on everything that will admit of betting. His friend, Bob Burbank, is foxier and always bets—winning with provoking regularity. They both love Nell Gatewood, who lives with Aunt Elizabeth, an old maid and her legal guardian. Dick goes broke betting so frequently until he cannot carry out a plan to elope. He breaks his promise to stop betting and Nell is furious at him. She gives him one more chance and that very night he bets all his cab fare with Bob, loses—bets his pawn ticket, loses—bets his theatre tickets with which he was going to take Nell to the play and loses again. Dick is in despair. Bob calls Nell on the phone and tattles on his rival. Nell angrily agrees to go with him on the forfeited tickets. Dick stands at the theatre door as they enter and Nell snubs him. Walking along the street, dead broke, looking at the clock in Childs' restaurant, he notices a jolly old fat man, with a souse, being jostled by two pickpockets. He interferes with good effect, saves the old man's money. The fat man insists upon his accompanying him, to protect him further. He is so jolly that Dick agrees. The old fellow heads for a gambling house, and against his protests, Dick goes with him. The fat man begins to play poker with his enormous roll of money. He is an easy mark until Dick whispers to him that he is being cheated. The old fellow lets Dick take his place, and for the first time in months Dick wins! With another man's money he plays so shrewdly that he stops the cheating and breaks the house bank. They leave amid the angry looks of the gamblers. The old fellow insists upon accompanying Dick to his home. Late as it is, Dick finds some creditors waiting for him. The amiable souse insists on paying the bill with some of the money Dick has won. They go upstairs to Dick's room, where Dick puts his guest to bed and sleeps in a Morris chair. The next morning the old fellow is still sleeping when Bob comes in to tease his unlucky friend. Dick tells his story. Bob is incredulous and Dick calls up Nell to ask her forgiveness. She promises him one more chance if he promises never to gamble again. Dick does, and Bob laughs and departs. He calls on Nell that afternoon, proposes again and, on being refused, offers to wager that Dick will be betting more than ever. Dick is seen assisting the old man to his feet, dressing him and getting him ready for the street. The old chap insists on more champagne, however, and he starts the day well by taking some. Dick refuses to divide up on the money which he offers and the old fellow then asks Dick to take him to his office. He is a broker, and he creates a scene when he arrives at his office soused, in a dress suit the worse for wear and with his new-found friend. A clerk greets him with the news that a big industrial stock in which he is interested is falling fast on the Exchange. Back at Nell's home, Nell has agreed to wager ten kisses against a ten-pound box of candy that Dick will no longer bet—Bob to get the kisses. In the broker's office the old fellow suddenly gets a tip from a friend and calls in his clerk, ordering him to buy up every bit of the fluctuating stock. He turns to Dick, offers him half of the night's winnings again, offering to place it on the stock. Dick yields and the two are seen reading the returns over the ticker and losing all hope on it. Bob is pressing his suit with Nell back home—then Dick's luck turns with stocks. They are rewarded and the old broker pays him outright for his winnings, while Dick runs for a taxicab. He hustles uptown, stops at a parsonage for a minister and then races to Nell's home to tell her the good news.

He dashes into the parlor, finds Bob there, and is offended at what he believes to be Nell's going back on him.

Nell sees his pockets bulging out, asks the cause, and he unloads his profits. He admits that he has been speculating. Nell cries for a minute and Bob laughs exultantly. But Nell sees that Dick really loves her. She goes to him and he whispers something to her while the old maid aunt is gushing over Bob. Dick asks her to elope again, and this time she accedes. They slip down the steps to the automobile and Nell writes a note for the maid to bring up to Bob. The message reaches him as he is trying to stave off the attentions of the old maid aunt. It says, "Auntie is my guardian and pays all my bills. You have won the ten kisses. Collect and charge it to me. Nell." The old maid snatches the paper as Bob drops it to run to the window. There he sees the automobile speed away with Dick and Nell happy in it, and he sinks into a big Morris chair in a swoon. Auntie presses his hands, strokes his brow and kisses him back to consciousness again.

PUNCH

SOME DOCTOR (Feb. 13).—Young Dr. Green's village practice is small and he finds himself in straitened circumstances. One morning the landlord calls for his rent and states that the doctor must pay up or vacate. The doctor has a fertile brain, however, and hits upon a scheme that he thinks will raise the wherewithal. He writes a note:

"I am a poor outcast afflicted with smallpox. I die, rather than contaminate others.

"Despairingly,

"Jas. Smith."

Placing the note in the pocket of an old suit of clothes, borrowed from his gardener, he lays the clothes on the trunk of the local river and awaits developments. An old fisherman discovers the clothes, alarms the neighbors, and in a twinkling half the population of the village is eagerly examining the clothes of the supposed suicide for a mark of identification. They do not find the note, as it is tucked in the small watch pocket of the trousers. At this point Dr. Green appears and finds the note, which he reads. Of course, all are thrown into a panic through fear of contamination and rush the doctor off to his office, where he vaccinates all hands at one dollar per vaccination. When the landlord appears again for his rent he is paid instantly and also submits to a vaccination operation at the doctor's own rate.

On the same reel:

A CLOSE SHAVE.—A salesman passing through a Western town, sells safety razors to all the miners, much to the dissatisfaction of the one barber.

Some lady salesmen visit the town a few weeks later selling barber supplies, and the owner of the shop contracts to take a great quantity of materials if the girls will pose in his place as "lady barbers." They consent for the sake of the sale and the next day as the men pass the store they read a placard announcing "Lady Barbers in Attendance." One and all flock into the shop. The girls ask what razors they have been using. The safety razors are displayed, but the girls refuse to shave them unless they throw the safety razors away.

This is done in short order, and as each man takes his place in the chair, a girl presides—but only for a second. The barber deftly executes the shave—but the victim leaves, content, positive that he has been shaved by the girl.

That evening, after taking a big order, the girls board an East-bound train, leaving a crowd of miners mourning their loss.

Next day, they all stroll sadly into the old shop, minus their safety, and realizing how badly they were stung.

RELIANCE

BUD TILDEN, MAIL THIEF (Feb. 12).—Bud Tilden, a mountaineer, is in love with pretty Jeannette. Hank Holliday, his rival, tries to win the girl away from Bud. Finding this useless, he resorts to mean methods. He places an improper book in Bud's pocket and then, before all the men, he takes it out and shows them the sort of literature Bud reads. He decides that Jeannette must know of it, so, wrapping up the book, he addresses it to Jeannette and drops it in the mail. Determined that his sweetheart shall not see the volume, Bud holds up the carrier and secures the book. He is apprehended and arrested.

But at his trial, when the Judge hears the whole story, Bud is freed and Hank is taken into custody. Bud loses no time in jumping on his horse and making his way to Jeannette, who waits for him amid the Blue Mountains of Kentucky.

WITHIN THE TEN COUNT (Feb. 15)—Billy leaves his country home and starts for the city, determined to win fame and fortune as a pugilist. He has already shown some skill in the art and feels very confident of his ability. He is under the care of Larry Delevan, a well-known trainer, who feels confident he can make a big fighter out of the raw country boy. Billy leaves his sweetheart, Mary, back on the farm. At first he is only anxious for the money that it may bring her to him, and that he may give her the good things of life. But he meets Vida, a pretty show girl, and she uses all her arts and wiles on him with the result that he is soon infatuated with her and forgets Mary. Billy takes Vida out to various cafes in the city and she urges him to drink champagne, which he does, time and time again, thus breaking his training. Delevan is not pleased with Vida's influence on the boy and tries in many ways to break the intimacy.

The day of Billy's big fight arrives. The boy is in good condition and there seems no reason why he should not win the championship. Mary, unable to bear Billy's long silence, seeks him in the city and arrives on the day of the fight. In his dressing room she looks through a hole in the wall and watches the battle.

Billy feels very sure of his ability, but in the eighth round he is knocked senseless. He has lost; Delevan is finished with him. All his city friends desert him. Vida laughs at him; she cannot bother with a has-been. Desperate and alone, Billy finds himself on a park bench, a common tramp, when slowly the voice of the referee penetrates his brain; he is counting nine; one more and he will be the loser. It was all a dream; he has a chance still. With a great effort he scrambles to his feet and wins the fight.

Later, in his dressing room, surrounded by hosts of flattering friends, he remembers the dream and what would have happened had he been the loser and not the winner.

Mary comes forward and he takes her hand. Slipping off his championship belt, he hands it to Delevan, saying. "I'm through." Delevan cannot believe it, but Billy is firm. He leaves the bright lights of Broadway and the glories of the ring and, hand in hand with the girl who truly loves him, he returns—home!

GAUMONT

ON THE BRINK OF DISHONOR (Feb. 25).—Mr. and Mrs. Darrell, contentedly married, invite Mr. and Mrs. Lorrimer, their city neighbors, to spend a week at their country home. Mr. Darrell finds Mrs. Lorimer interesting. His interest grows. Mrs. Darrell notices it. Mrs. Darrell, looking out of her window, sees her husband and Mrs. Lorimer in earnest conversation. Their actions are affectionate. When Mrs. Lorimer later comes into the house her reception by Mrs. Darrell is cold. In the evening Mrs. Darrell sees the silhouette of Mrs. Lorrimer in the hallway. It moves toward Mr. Darrell's study. Mrs. Darrell follows. She sees Mrs. Lorrimer sit at a desk and write a note. She leaves it on the table and silently returns to her room. Mrs. Darrell opens the note, which is addressed to her husband. It reads: "I am deeply hurt by your wife's attitude. To-morrow I shall be at your old shooting lodge, Louvray, at four o'clock. Until then we must not be seen together. Agnes Lorrimer." Mrs. Darrell seals the letter and puts it where she knows her husband will find it. She then writes to Mr. Lorrimer, who has gone away, telling him that his wife has the tryst appointment at the Louvray Lodge. Mr. Darrell and Mrs. Lorrimer meet at the Lodge. Suddenly the door is opened. Mrs. Darrell confronts them.

Mr. Lorrimer has received the anonymous letter. Enraged at the possibility of his wife's unfaithfulness, he hastens to the Darrell home. Mrs. Lorrimer is out. He takes a revolver and hurriedly goes out. Mrs. Darrell is accusing Mrs. Lorrimer and Mr. Darrell of their shame when the outraged wife sees Mr. Lorrimer dash up on his horse. Mrs. Darrell now regrets the move which will bring dire trouble to her husband. Accordingly, to save him, she has to save Mrs. Lorrimer.

She pushes Mrs. Lorrimer into an adjoining room. When Lorrimer rushes in, revolver in hand, there is only Mr. and Mrs. Darrell to receive him. He is quick to see, however, that all is not right. He senses the "double cross." The door, unfortunately, had not been altogether closed. He hears his wife move within. He dashes aside the door and, grasping the culprit by the hand, jerks her into the room where the Lorrimers wait. In spite of the suspicious circumstances it might never have become known to Lorrimer had not his glance fallen upon the table. Here, where it had been carelessly laid down, was another note to Darrell. It read: "My dear Friend: It would be a crime for you to ruin your wife's happiness. Also for me to break the heart of my husband. I will find an excuse for leaving your house to-night. Agnes."

There is an exchange of glances, a little anguish mixed with relief, and all four go out into the world to attain the conclusion which every spectator may draw for himself.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION OF GREATER NEW YORK, INC.,

LOCAL No. 1

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Secretary-Treasurer—Robert Levy.
Recording Secretary—George Epstein
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—Ralph Knaster.

Telephone—Stuyvesant 572.
Office—133 Third Avenue

The Moving Picture Machine Operators Union No. 1 held their last regular meeting on Monday, February 3, 1913, at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street, New York. Pres. Robt. Goldblatt called the meeting to order at 12:30 A. M. The meeting was the last before the entertainment and ball, which takes place on Monday, February 10, 1913, at Palm Garden. There was a large attendance, and all business was settled pertaining to the ball. President Goldblatt told the boys that at the next meeting he will place before the body the proposition of sick benefit.

For the benefit of operators who are not familiar with advantages of our union. "Why should a physician join a medical society?" "Why should a lawyer affiliate himself with the Bar Association?" "What induces a business man to pay initiation fees and dues into the Chamber of Commerce?" These people join the society of their business or profession for the standing it gives them, for the advantages of exchange of ideas and community of effort along well defined lines. Labor unions uniformly secure better wages, shorter hours of labor, improved conditions and better treatment for all the men engaged in the trade.

GEORGE EPSTEIN
Recording Secretary M. P. M. O. Union No. 1.

Trades unions make for a high class of workmanship. A union card is an excellent guarantee of skill. Trade unions care for their sick and needy, and many dollars are given to charity.

Now, brother operators, it is for your benefit, and I advise you to get into the Moving Picture Machine Operators Union No. 1 of New York while the entrance fee is within your reach. In this issue you will see a picture of one of the trustees of this union, and with men of such character you can be proud to say brother to him, and surely a man of this kind is a pride to the industry. His name is Mike

MIKE BERKOWITZ
Trustee M. P. M. O. Union No. 1.

Berkowitz, and he was chief operator nineteen years at Eden Musee, on Twenty-third street, New York City, where there is to be seen the world in wax and many other interesting things. Brother Berkowitz is at present in business at 210 East Fourteenth street. The nature of his business is repairing machines and the concern is called The Emergency Machine Repair Company. Another picture in this issue is of George Epstein, Rec. Secy. of M. P. M. O. U. No. 1. Brother Epstein is another member to be proud of; his work for the organization would be hard to duplicate. He is an expert picture projector, working for the Educational Alliance. Brother Epstein is credited with the present system of books kept for the organization, and words are inadequate to tell of his great work.

As an example of peculiarity that many of the operators have to contend with when employed by exhibitors who have practically no knowledge of the technical side of the motion picture machine, film or other accessories of the theatre, is one that was experienced by one of our brothers, Ben Friedman. He is employed by a Jewish man, who, though as an employer is a prince, is nevertheless shy in his speaking and understanding of the English language. Here it is as Ben describes it:

"Last July, on one hot day, the excello arc lamps outside the theatre were giving trouble, and I naturally was asked by the boss to find the trouble, and found that the carbons were feeding too fast, causing the carbons to 'freeze' and cut off the light. I rectified the trouble and the boss naturally wanted to know what the cause was, and I for the moment forgot that he would not grasp the meaning of the technical term 'freezing.' I said to him, 'Pop, the carbons were froze,' and he answered me, 'How kin dis be, der carbons should freeze in der summertime?'"

Next regular meeting will be Monday, February 17th. Nomination of officers and other interesting business. A full attendance is requested.

INTERNATIONAL ALLIANCE THEATRICAL STAGE EMPLOYEES

Policy of the Moving Picture News

The following night lettergram and my answer will speak for themselves. Unfortunately the forms were closed for February 1st issue.—Ed. M. P. N.

Cleveland, O., Jan. 29, 1913.

Mr. Alfred H. Saunders,
30 West 13th Street, New York.

Kindly explain in the next issue of the News the policy it maintains towards the International Alliance Theatrical Stage Employees and the new faction of operators in New York City. Also is Ralph Knaster on the editorial staff and employed to officially edit the "Chat Column" An answer will be greatly appreciated by myself and many others of Local No. 160 International Alliance Theatrical Stage Employees.

S. M. HULBERT.

New York, Jan. 30, 1913.

Mr. S. M. Hulbert,
Local 160, International Alliance Stage Employees,
Cleveland, Ohio.

Dear Sir:

Your night letter received this A. M., too late for this week's issue of the News. In reply thereto, I beg to state that the policy I maintain towards the I. A. T. S. E. is perfectly harmonious and absolutely neutral. At the same time the motion picture operators, in my opinion, are a strong enough body of men to have an organization of their own to manage their own affairs and be entirely independent of any other union.

I do not know whether the same position of affairs exists in Cleveland as does in New York, but I am given to understand that in New York a spotlight worker is able to run a moving machine in the same theatre, and by so doing can hold practically two positions, but that a moving picture operator is not allowed to operate the still more simple spotlight. This is why the auxiliary in New York seceded from the I. A. T. S. E. Personally, I have nothing whatever against any of the unions, and the I. A. T. S. E. has just as much freedom to the colmuns of the News as have the Local No. 1.

Ralph Knaster is not one of the editorial staff and is not employed officially to edit the Chat Column. He has simply availed himself of my offer to every union in the country to send me particulars of what their union is doing, and is practically the only one who has accepted this offer.

When in Chicago I visited the members there; in St. Louis I also saw the secretary, while in Cleveland I also saw an official of your auxiliary, and in each instance I was promised full reports of the meetings, but up to the present none of them have materialized.

If you wish to say anything controverting matters that appear in the Chat Column, your letter or statements will have as much prominence as does Ralph Knaster's. This answer will appear following your telegram in our issue of the 8th, and if you have anything further to augment or any statement to make, I will be very glad to receive it for insertion in that issue.

Yours faithfully,
(Signed) ALFRED H. SAUNDERS.

MANUFACTURERS' NOTES

It is reported that Jack London and E. Phillips Oppenheim will shortly enter into a contract with a moving picture company of New York to deliver to them two scenarios a week.

In its annual report, just issued, the Motor Boat Club of America, whose officers had charge of the international races for the Harmsworth Cup last fall, announces that the fast motor boat Tech, Jr., which attempted to break the time record for a mile over the measured course in Huntington Bay on the day following the international races, was not officially timed.

The Heins trophy, which was the prize offered for the fastest mile, will therefore go to the Baby Reliance III, owned by Commodore J. Stuart Blackton, of the Atlantic Yacht Club, and also of the Vitagraph Company of America, which covered the mile at the average speed of 32.23 knots or 37.11 statute miles an hour.

The Electric Club of Chicago held the largest meeting of its history last Thursday noon in the banquet hall of the Sherman House, the full membership of 600 being in in attendance. After the business of the day was transacted in the report of the nominating committee of officers for the ensuing year, Charles E. Nixon, of the Selig Polyscope Company, made an address on "The History and Current Condition of the Moving Picture Industry." The discourse was illustrated with the great Selig films, "The Coming of Columbus" and "The Count of Monte Cristo."

AS IN A LOOKING GLASS
(Monopol 3-reel Feature)

On Wednesday night, February 5th, an interesting production, with the popular picture actress, Marion Leonard, in the lead, was exhibited at the Broadway Theatre to an appreciative audience consisting of press representatives and others.

Barring one or two inconsistencies which could be overlooked, the production is one of unusual merit. The story might have had its inspiration from Kipling's "Vampire," for the woman is pictured as a lure for men. Some wonderful effects have been obtained through flashing on the screen scenes emblematic of the real nature of the woman, but the climax of interest and appreciation was reached when Cupid kisses the old witch which the young woman is mirrored as being, and from the blackened form emerges a beautiful woman dressed in pure white.

There is no doubt that the Monopol Film Company will score a tremendous success with this picture.

RUBY COMBINATION FEATURES

In a short interview obtained with Leon J. Rubenstein, of the recently incorporated film company known as the Ruby Feature Film Company, it was ascertained that among the Ruby Combination Features, by which name the product of the company will be known, will appear a number of subjects of special interest to educators and philanthropists. One of the subjects now under preparation deals with juvenile delinquency.

In connection with this picture, Mr. Rubenstein has secured the consent of a number of noted men prominent in the movement for the suppression of crime, to photograph them with the moving picture camera. Some of the films which have already been obtained, the writer was privileged to see.

Later on white slavery will be dealt with in film by the Ruby Feature Film Company.

IOWA NOTES

If the Burke bill now in the Iowa legislature passes, this state will have one of the most drastic motion picture censor laws in the United States. It provides a state board and forbids the showing of any films showing crime, pictures built upon sensational plots of the dime novel sort whose general effect is to put wrong ideas into the heads of boys and girls, or pictures which in any way appeal to the baser passions.

Fire which destroyed the Meffhifer block in Hampton, Iowa, caused the explosion of five hundred motion picture reels belonging to the Viles Film Exchange. The company sustained a $2,500 loss with no insurance.

William Lawrence, who has been playing the role of Joshua Whitcomb in "The Old Homestead" for nearly ten years, passed through Iowa last week with his company. Mr. Lawrence thinks he has found three reasons for the decadence of the modern drama. He names them in the following order: automobiles, moving pictures and vaudeville. He claims that autos have shortened the New York season by about two months. Vaudeville, of course, has long been a detractor from the legitimate stage. It will probably be a source of considerable satisfaction to motion picture managers to know that Mr. Lawrence places them ahead of vaudeville in the race for patronage that formerly belonged to the drama

The week of January 13th saw the beginning of another extensive improvement in the plant of the Selig Polyscope Company's Western branch in Los Angeles. Property recently acquired immediately north of the studio will be utilized in extending the grounds clear to Duane street, thus giving the plant a fine frontage on three sides of the block. The great concrete mission wall which is such a distinguished feature of the Edendale valley, where the studio is located, will be extended to and along Duane street, and will be parked inside and out, as is the older wall, with grass and flowers. It will encompass a number of new ornate concrete buildings, which are needed to house the increasing equipment and additional acting force of the Selig Pacific Coast establishment.

Do Your Patrons Know You?

You can make the weekly Gaumont Graphic your official House Organ. At an inconsiderable cost we will devote the whole of one of its pages to you and your theatre.

This edition you can then give or sell at a nominal price to your patrons.

You are too shrewd not to appreciate the value of this advertising.

Write for prices and details.

KINEMACOLOR SUCCEEDS WITH QUADRUPLE EXPOSURES

Remarkable success has been achieved by the Kinemacolor Company of America in their endeavor to secure triple and quadruple exposures of scenes, each scene in color.

Utilizing the triple or quadruple exposure of scenes, ghostly visitors may be made to pass between the audience and the players of the drama pictured, and yet both players in the actual scene and players in the "ghostly" scene which intervenes, are shown in absolutely natural color. The new process is already in use by the five Kinemacolor companies which are now producing comedies and dramas in California.

PILOT FILMS

"ONE-REEL FEATURES"

TO THE TRADE:-

We take this means of thanking the trade for the many orders we have received on our first release. The enthusiasm with which "The Blacksmith's Story" has been received is certainly very gratifying.

Our second release "THE TWO GLASSES", FEBRUARY 20TH, is better than our first, and remarkable for its diversity of scenes; where the author, Ella Wheeler Willcox, has drawn a pretty story of the conversation between the wine glass and the water glass.

Our third release for FEBRUARY 27TH, "THE DOLL AND THE DEVIL", is a highly costumed spectacular comedy from the old French opera, arranged by Roy L. McCardell, and will be the first film to give the trade an idea of the efficiency of our new plant, both in the depth and largeness of the scenes; not to mention the fine lustrous photography obtained by our extensive lighting system.

A SMALL BOY AND A LARGE PANIC

FOLLOWING up my editorial of last week I want to say that I have written for particulars to the Department of the State Fire Marshal at Albany, and have received some good information in reply, which I will be able to take up in an early issue, as the correspondence is not quite complete. In the meantime, I would like to ask the Exhibitors the main cause of panics, —in nine cases out of ten the reply would be—the smoke from the booth —or, the flames from the apertures coming from the film. Now, how can this be avoided? Very simply, and to aid in this I am sending the suggestion to the Fire Department at Albany, that it may be embodied in the state law. Before it is made a law, I want the exhibitors, everywhere, to immediately follow out the suggestion made. It is very simple and can be procured by the outlay of a few cents.

If we take the average booth, we find three or four apertures, one to look out, one for the rays from the machine to go through, and generally another for utility purposes. Covering these, there is generally provided a drop shutter, which, when the booth gets hot, or the flames reach the cord, or thread holding the shutter suspended, immediately closes it and releases the shutter so that it drops down. In how many cases does this act? I question once in a dozen times, therefore to avoid the first panic, A PANE OF OPTICAL GLASS SHOULD BE GLAZED IN EVERY APERTURE OR WINDOW OF THE BOOTH. This will exclude any smoke getting into the audience, and will exclude any flame, and to a very large extent, deafen the noise of the machine.

Some of my readers may ask "Where am I to get optical glass?" It can be procured from any good plate glass dealer, who for a few cents will fit these windows to the apertures in the booth. Yes, but this may refract the rays, say some. Not at all Every booth that Kinemacolor uses is provided with plate glass in the apertures, and as is well known, no light is lost, the pictures appear on the screen perfect, so that if the Fire Department of New York City will only compel every booth to be equipped with glass in the apertures where necessary, one great source for panics will be eliminated.

Now then, Mr. Exhibitor, for your own sake, for your own comfort of mind, for the safety of your patrons, do as I have said, and let me know who is the first to adopt this method voluntarily, otherwise it must be made compulsory.

THE OPERATORS' BALL

It was my privilege, as well as pleasure, to be in attendance at Palm Garden, New York City, on the occasion of the operators' ball. I have attended many functions, civic, fraternal and social, and while comparisons are "odious," yet I must take my hat off to the operators for the admirable manner in which they managed the function, and I can say with absolute truth that of all the 2 500 odd guests present not one went away dissatisfied. Great credit must be given to Ralph Knaster for the way he worked, and also to Robert Goldblatt and the committee around him for the quality of results.

It was very fitting testimonial in the shape of a loving cup that was presented to President Goldblatt for his untiring work in organizing such a splendid body of operators as Union No. 1 holds, and every one of the audience appreciated the testimonial, which was presented in a fitting speech by our good friend "Bunny." Even in the midst of festivities Goldblatt's heart and thought went out to the garment workers, who are on strike. He made a touching appeal to the members present and taking the loving cup round, he gathered quite a little in the way of collections to aid these workers I sincerely trust that this is only one occasion of many that the operators of New York and vicinity will hold festival.

SUIT OF HENKLE VS. UNIVERSAL FILM CO. FOR RECEIVERSHIP WITHDRAWN

Three big pieces of news were given out just before the Moving Picture News went to press.

First: Messrs. Carl Laemmle and W. H Swanson have bought out Mr. P. A. Powers' stock in the Universal Company.

Second: Mr. Powers has resigned as vice-president of the Universal and member of the board of directors.

Third: The so-called receivership suit filed against the Universal by a former employee named Henkle has been withdrawn.

Mr. Powers owned $204,000 worth of Universal common stock and $75,000 worth of preferred. All this is now owned jointly by Mr. Laemmle and Mr. Swanson.

The utmost good feeling exists between the parties to the deal. It is said that disagreement as to the best policy of the company caused the sale and purchase of the stock.

"We are sorry to lose Mr. Powers personally," said Mr. Laemmle to the News, "but we had reached a point where it was a case of buy or sell. Matters are now in such shape that the atmosphere is cleared and we can put into immediate effect some of the many progressive ideas we have had in mind."

THE GREAT UNKNOWN

(Eclair Two-Reel Feature)

Among the picture stories of the Canadian Northwest which have been recently produced, "The Great Unknown," from Eclair, stands out as a shining example of what can be accomplished with the exhilarating atmosphere of that irresistible land

Even the sleds and the dog teams have been pressed into service in this remarkable picture, and it is astonishingly easy while witnessing the passing of the picture on the screen to imagine oneself on snow shoes, plodding through the powdery white of the Northland.

The story opens in a saloon. A stranger, an unkempt old man, opens the door and enters. After a few preliminaries usual in saloon life, the old man proceeds to tell his story.

The story is one of pathos and disappointment. When a young man he had lost his fortune. The girl whom he was to have married accompanied him to the hills to seek a fortune in the mines. Failing to strike it rich right away, the young woman, unable to stand the constant privation and disappointment, upbraids him. The old man pictures himself tramping through the snow and eventually, through the information of an Indian girl, making a rich strike. On his way back to the young woman he becomes exhausted with privation and cold.

His rival, a man supposedly a friend, comes across him lying unconscious on the trail. He leaves him where he is, and goes to the young woman, telling her that he is dead. The unconscious man is, however, discovered by the Indian maid and cared for. On his return to his cabin he finds the young woman married to the other man.

The story ends with him denouncing the keeper of the saloon, who is in reality the very man of whom he has spoken, who has sat with his wife, listening to the story. The lights go out, two pistols flash, and the last scene shows the two men lying dead, the woman prostrate with grief on the breast of the stranger.

NEWMAN EQUIPS NEW THEATRE

The Newman Manufacturing Company, Cincinnati, and 101 Fourth avenue, New York City, have equipped the new North Star Amusement Company's theatre, 106th street and Fifth avenue, New York, with all the brass frame, easel and rail work. This theatre is considered by authorities to be one of the finest modern picture theatres in the world. The Newman Manufacturing Company were selected to do this work and given preference on account of their reliability and the high-grade work that they turn out.

THE BELLS
(Reliance Two-reel Release)

Never was a story for the screen more wisely chosen than that of "The Bells." Written, dramatized and produced upon the legitimate stage almost before the first embryonic idea of the moving picture had taken on any definite shape, it comes to us to-day as one of the most remarkable adaptations to film that the motion picture era has known.

"The Bells," which in its dramatized form is an adaptation from M. M. Erckmann, Chatrian's book entitled "The Polish Jew," by Leopold Lewis, was first produced at the

SCENE FROM "THE BELLS" (RELIANCE)

Royal Lyceum Theatre, London, on November 25, 1871, with Sir Henry Irving, then plain Henry Irving, in the role of Mathias, and had a run of one hundred and fifty-one consecutive nights.

In the Reliance production of "The Bells" they have been particularly fortunate in being able to avail themselves of the services of E. P. Sullivan, who starred in the production with his own repertoire company all through the United States

Needless to say, Mr. Sullivan is thoroughly at home in the difficult role of Mathias and in consequence of this fact, and of the efficient support given him in the capable work of other members of the Reliance Company, the production has that smoothness and finesse which we can only hope may be attendant on more of the moving picture productions of the future. In the dream scenes in the picture the most remarkable effects have been secured, and the action of the pictured story and the tale of the mesmerized man are almost simultaneous in the double exposure work of this portion of the film.

The cast, which may be interesting to the reader, is as follows:

Mathias	E. P. Sullivan
Christian	Irving Cummings
Annette	Gertrude Robinson
Walter	George Seigmann
Hans	Wilbur Hudson
Mesmerist	James Ashley
Polish Jew	Irving Lewis
Katherine	Sue Balfour
Sozel	Margaret Wheeler

This film, which is in two reels, will be released February 19th.

VITAGRAPH TO RELEASE AMUSING EPISODES FROM "PICKWICK PAPERS"

The drollery of Charles Dickens, as illustrated in his conception of "Pickwick Papers," is so quaintly different from our modern ideas of comedy in situation and action as to have taken its place among the semi-classic in English literature. The bas-relief, the piquancy with which the characters of Dickens stand forth from their oftentimes sombre backgrounds establish in the motion picture field an opportunity for clever character actors which has had no precedent and which will doubtless never be excelled.

From the Fagin of "Oliver Twist" to the multiplicity of characters, quaint and weird, in "Barnaby Rudge," the little Nell of "Old Curiosity Shop," we come to the comedy element in the mind of the great novelist, as depicted in the adventures of Mr. Pickwick. And here we come to the point where the laugh of the intelligent reader is joined by the illiterate of at least two nations, as well as of those in a higher walk of life. The little boy will laugh with his much-read granddad at the sorry adventures of the good-natured Pickwick when John Bunny, in his inimitable interpretation of Mr. Pickwick, steps forth upon the ghostly screen of the picture theatre.

SCENE FROM "PICKWICK PAPERS" (VITAGRAPH)

The Vitagraph Company took a step in the right direction when they sent their people to England to the exact location of the scenes of the Dickens masterpiece, in order to give a true representation of the humor of the novelist as set forth in "Pickwick Papers." The conception of the part of Pickwick by John Bunny could hardly be improved upon.

Three of the adventures of Pickwick are now ready for release, of which the writer has been privileged to see only two, namely, "The Adventure of the Honorable Event" and "The Adventure of the Westgate Seminary," both of which have been delightfully interpreted.

It is understood that should the first three reels be gratefully received by an appreciative public, other films of adventures from the same work will follow in the near future. The first release date on the "Pickwick Papers" series will be February 28th.

"THE LOST MEMORY"

(Great Northern Special)

In view of the fact that original themes for the motion picture story seem to be growing more scarce each day, the Great Northern special feature film, in two reels, viewed by us a few days ago is of special interest.

To say that this film, which is entitled "The Lost Memory," is most remarkable from every aspect is not saying too much. The splendid and spontaneous action of the piece as maintained by those to whom were entrusted the principal roles and by those who so ably supported them in the smaller roles, is something in itself worthy of mention. Seldom has there been seen in pictures a more splendidly enacted drama.

THE LOST MEMORY

The camera man, too, has made an extraordinary bid for laurels, which he has most assuredly won, for what could be more remarkable in photographic effect than the approach of the thunder storm, its actual occurrence, and the picture of the terrible disaster through the falling of the lightning-struck tree?

The story is that of a wealthy merchant who, having loaned a considerable amount of money to a banking firm in a distant town, is informed of the danger of bankruptcy in which the firm stands, through the dishonesty of one of its employees. He is urged to visit the bank, and when the second warning telegram arrives he immediately hurries away in his automobile, intending to reach the distant town with all possible speed. The machine, however, breaks down on the road. He hires another and proceeds on his journey. A terrible thunder storm breaks overhead and the tree accident of which we have already spoken occurs, the tree falling upon the automobile and crushing it.

At the inn when the second automobile was pressed into service a passenger was taken aboard whose likeness to the wealthy merchant was most remarkable. This man was killed in the accident, while the merchant, though not injured bodily, suffered complete loss of memory. A natural sequence of events follows; the dead man is taken for the merchant, and the merchant wanders away, unable to tell where he is or who he is. At last, after sojourning for some time in a gipsy camp, he takes to the road again, steals a ride on top of a train, is jostled off and eventually finds his way to his own dwelling. His memory returns as he looks at a photograph of his little daughter.

The story is good and has a wealth of sensation without the too frequent disgusting play of melodramatic action.

REMARKABLE DISPLAY OF ALASKAN PICTURES

Mention was made in this magazine some time ago of the work of Beverly B. Dobbs in collecting moving pictures of life as it is in the far North. Our attention was again drawn to this interesting collection of moving pictures of life as it is in the Far North. Our attention was the explanatory remarks of the photographer, in Carnegie Hall on Friday and Saturday evenings last.

Mr. Dobbs has spent some ten or twelve years in preparing the collection of pictures. One of the most remarkable animal pictures, possibly, that has ever been exhibited is that of a tremendous flock of walrus, principally cows with their young. The surface of the sea is one moving mass of these huge beasts. Mr. Dobbs tells us he has been waiting some ten years to get just such a picture as this. The scene of this remarkable revelation is in the Arctic Ocean, off the coast of Siberia.

FICTION is stranger than truth, but truth is a handy little article for the purpose of making fiction appear less fictitious. One can imagine things that couldn't be, but psychologists say one cannot do it without having a foundation of things that could be—nay, that have been.

The human mind is limited by its experience.

Elementary psychology is brought to mind by a news dispatch from Mexico City. Assuming its truth, it goes a step ahead of what we have termed as impossible in moving picture shows.

It goes the "red-blooded" scenario one better.

But hear the boiled-down dispatch—the bald account of a combat pre-Homeric and post-Cohanic:

> Three Americans dining in a restaurant here took umbrage at insulting remarks made by Mexicans. A fight ensued, the Americans using only their fists. These three whipped twenty Mexicans, and then the police were summoned. It required the combined efforts of twelve policemen to arrest the Americans. Several policemen were injured.

This cold telegraphic report vindicates all the three-reel features. Three Americans (we can see them—cool, athletic, smiling, close-up centre) whip twenty Mexicans without turning a hair. The minions of the law rush into the picture. Armed to the teeth and four to one against our Anglo-Saxon champions, "several of the policemen were injured."

Talk about Roland at Roncesvalles! Talk about Leonidas, David, Sampson or Lincoln J. Carter! Is not this latest feat of derring-do an appropriate subject for an epic? It is thus that the traditions of a mighty race are made and carried forward within and without the moving picture play.

John Bunny is Sir John Falstaff in real life—minus the whiskers. He tips the beam at 283 pounds, although he is less than 5 feet 5 inches in height. His face is his fortune. Bunny's rotund countenance has made Vitagraph comics famous. He has a new forty-horsepower touring car, but is fearful of running it over ten miles an hour. Everyone knows him. "Last summer when I was abroad, posing for a series of 'Pickwick Papers,' I had many amusing experiences," said Bunny the other day. "The Vitagraph films had been shown in England for a long time and I was recognized everywhere I went. One night in Belfast I left my hotel to take a stroll. Hardly had I gone a block when I ran into three young Irish girls. One of them let out a loud yell. 'Holy Saint Patrick!' she cried, ''tis th' man in the picthures!'"

Senseless Criticism

Senseless criticism of the moving picture should cease. They are more a power for good than many of the things that have long been accepted as beneficial. The pictures of life in foreign countries are far more interesting than the dry geographies and histories in the schoolroom. It is difficult to see why people who love the moving pictures should be any worse than those who attend the varieties or the vaudeville theatres. The price is within the reach of the poor, and these people are entitled to as much enjoyment out of life as their more fortunate brothers. If the moving pictures are taken away, the dullness of their existence will be rendered more unbearable. They are entitled to both sunshine and shadow.

"Kind friends," The Great Reformer cried (he works one day in seven), "refrain from moving pictures or you'll never get to heaven! These picture shows, for young and old, they surely are pernicious!" So declared the Great Reformer, and he glared around officious.

"The patrons of these picture shows neglect their shops and homes. It's true they may work hard all day, but they have no right to roam. They should pay a silver offering and just listen to me, while I tell each and every one just what is best to see."

"Were you ever in a picture show?" asked the laborer big and strong. "Well, no," the Great Reformer said, "but I know that they are wrong!" But the Great Reformer's hearers did not care to longer stay—they just hastened to the picture show, few steps across the way.

The moving picture shows have come to stay, regardless of what some people have to say against them. Honest criticism is unobjectionable, but notoriety seekers who strive to condemn the good with the evil should be disregarded. othing is perfect. But then , again there are few things wholly bad. Every sensation monger in the country has taken a whack at the moving pictures. The majority of them, when cornered, admit that they have never visited a moving picture theatre and are amazed when one informs them of the educational and otherwise elevating releases found in the picture theatres. When ignorance is bliss, it is folly to be wise—sometimes.

Sentence Sermons

And the ticket seller said, as now: "How many?"—II Samuel xxiv:3.

Does the ticket seller say "How many," at your theatre, or isn't there anyone for him to say it to? If there isn't, Mr. Exhibitor, it's your fault. If you have a good operator who doesn't hurry over the film title, someone who can tastefully play the pictures, comfortable seats, and courteous attendants, the ticket seller will say "How many?" Otherwise it will be "Not any."

He made a release to the provinces.—Esther ii:18.

This releasing to the provinces, beloved, is a serious matter. The provinces, as you may realize, is a rather wide stretch of country west of New York, a territory where the money comes from. The people of these provinces have been restless of late. They have been requesting less of the exaggerated Western stories, the blood-and-thunder films and the overdrawn melodrama. They have been demanding the consistent and convincing firm telling the stories of the everyday people. Those producers who do not listen to the provinces will very soon not be releasing to them.

Many will seek to enter in and shall not be able.—Luke xiii:24.

This, my brethren, can well apply to the popularity of the moving picture. Many on a Saturday evening, or any other evening, for that matter, are seeking to enter and are not able. This proves convincingly that good pictures are in a preponderance and are able to overshadow those releases which might be, in vulgar parlance, off-color. When the open market comes, only the meritorious pictures will survive, and the great public will continue to seek to enter.

We have our days of deep mental depression over the general political situation of motography when it seems as if we were on a permanent boiled cabbage basis.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Everybody Writes, Including Father

LET us paraphrase that once popular ditty, "Everybody Works but Father," with "Everybody Writes, Including Father." Everybody is writing moving picture scripts, and father sometimes writes two or three. It is a rather new form of literary endeavor and was introduced when the moving picture became popular.

A few years ago the film manufacturer employed a hack writer who evolved little stories about the small boy who went into the street with sneeze powder, and caused everyone he met to sneeze. Then came the runaway horses, the Wild Western chases, and the five-cent "penny dreadful" stories. But the moving picture continued to gain new converts with startling rapidity and new ideas were essential The moving picture manufacturers then discharged their hack writers for scenario editors, who in turn advertised in moving picture trade journals and various magazines for "moving picture plots."

Then came the flood of manuscripts. Ideas on every conceivable subject were written up and fired into the editorial departments of the film producers. The editorial departments were enlarged and assistant readers were employed until, to-day, the more prominent moving picture concerns have staffs of men and women who read the picture play manuscripts and return those found unavailable.

Everybody writes 'em; the work looks quite easy. Really it is a most difficult form of literary labor and requires thought, time and study. About one picture play manuscript in every fifty is found available; about one writer in every one hundred succeeds as a picture playwright.

Prices paid for available plots vary. When the impossible manuscript is received but which nevertheless contains an unusual idea, the author is offered from $10 to $15 for his or her idea alone. A staff writer revamps the story in technical form about the idea. Sums varying from $20 to $100 are paid for manuscripts which contain an original idea suitable to the moving picture screen and presented in proper technical form.

Strange as it may seem, the successful writer of magazine and book fiction does not shine in the picture play writing profession The men equally successful as short story and picture play writers are few and far between. One reason, according to L. S. McCloskey, of Philadelphia, Pa., editor of the Lubin Company, is that the short story writer is too apt to approach picture play writing with contemptuous disdain. He will not study the limitations of the moving picture screen and is likely to believe that any old idea will do for the moving pictures.

"You would be surprised to see some of the names attached to manuscripts we receive," said Giles R. Warren, director of the Victor Company. "Some of them are names associated in the minds of the public with the highest forms of literature. Poets, for instance! We cannot film poetry, but I guess they must write the real stuff, for they, together with other literary stars, seem to be all of a quake for fear somebody will find out they are trying to earn an honest dollar or two catering to the film man. They need not sit up nights worrying. We don't get many good ones from these writers The trouble is that if they have an idea that's worth anything they can't bear to part with it to a film maker. They save it up for a story or a novel. Many seem to think they can dash off a scenario about something that is too weak or too trite to be used anywhere else. We want only the best."

What the picture play editor wants is the things people do, not a description of their character. When it comes to moving pictures, there is one proverb that tells the entire story, and that is, "Actions speak louder than words." To turn out a good picture play one must have the sense of the dramatic and the art of condensation. The picture play is written by the foot or inch, and one thousand feet of film is the average release. Convincing action and plot must be clearly condensed into the one thousand feet in order to be acceptable. Take a good situation, elucidate it, weave around it a strong, clean story. The sequence of events must proceed with pistol-shot rapidity and logical continuity. The action must be on the jump from beginning to end, with a strong climax.

The manuscript must be acted out, and impossible situations are the one real weakness of the average picture play manuscripts. One writer, a professional at that, submitted a plot in which Santa Claus came down the chimney, his clothing caught fire and he burned to death. It might be difficult to engage an actor to carry out that role. Some of the best plots are evolved by ladies, who seem strong for Western situations, with cowboys, sheriffs and Indians. Actors and actresses working for the film concerns are, many of them, proficient picture playwrights, and the army of successful free lances is rapidly growing.

Clean, humorous plots are in the greatest demand and the highest prices are paid for comedy. Good comic situations are a rarity, however, although the supply of dramatic themes remains undiminished.

It is estimated by moving picture manufacturers that at least ten thousand men and women are writing picture play manuscripts. Correspondence schools have appeared to take their money; special publications cater to them; and the moving picture trade journals conduct departments devoted to moving picture play writing. And yet the supply of good, clean comedy and high-class convincing drama is not equal to the demand. However, everybody's writing 'em, including father and mother, sister and the boys. They seem to be undiscouraged when their contributions are returned with regularity, and the number of literary aspirants is increasing by leaps and bounds.

Wants Western Plays

A. M. Kennedy, Western general manager for the Universal Film Company, now located at Hollywood, Cal., announces that he wants a number of big one, two or three-reel Western, Indian or military scripts. The highest prices will be paid for good stuff. Send Western scripts direct to him.

Convincing Stories

Do not send out stories in which the characters jump around mechanically. Make them logical and as true to life in motive and action as possible. Try and see the children of your brain perform. Ask yourself what you and your friends would do in such a situation. Give your action a semblance of life, and the editor will appreciate your endeavor. Have a mental picture of the scene as you write it—visualize.

How We Do It

A reader of this department wishes to know our method of work. Here it is: We get the idea maybe on the street, in the theatre, in our office or elsewhere. When it comes to us, it comes like a flash. We carry a notebook and immediately jot down that inspiration, no matter where we are. We have concluded to wait for a better opportunity, in the past—and the idea fled. Sometimes we have in stock two or three pages of ideas of "brights," as we call them. Before we write a script we take an idea and consider it mentally from every angle. We try and plot the proper environment, the number in the cast, the "lead," whether the idea can best be developed into a half-reel, full-reel, two or three-reel production; and, above all, try and mentally plot a sure-fire, right-from-the-jump opening. We have learned by experience that the proper beginning, something gripping and unusual, is half the battle. Some writers get their climax first and work from that. Sometimes we get our climax too early. We don't want it before we start—but sometimes it just arrives anyhow. When it does, we entertain it, plot it out and lay it aside. We find that when we have the right and proper beginning for a story that the plot unconsciously works to the climax in a logical sequence. In other words, the story almost writes itself. When the "big break" is due, it comes promptly, and if we have hewn strictly to the line, we are ready for it. Very often our scripts develop amazing possibilities. It seems that the entire matter has been taken out of our hands and that the story writes itself. Other writers report the same experience. From experience we find that our script ends logically just where we thought it ought to end. If we need a sub-title, or "leader" in the opening, we break the first scene. We rarely have over six sub-titles to an average script, and often less than that number. We never name our script until it is written, and give this subject much thought, and consequently we have had the names of but two scripts changed by editors. We write the script title, then the cast of characters—as small a cast as possible—then the synopsis. We never write the synopsis until after writing the script. We easily write the synopsis in 150 or 200 words and it is invariably on the first page with title and cast. We generally place our scene plot at the end of the script, but that is just an individual habit. We use swan linen, 8½x11, and always use a black ribbon on an Oliver typewriter No. 3, and single space. We make three carbon copies of all scripts, but never, even in our early days, did we send the same script to two or more editors at the same time. We do most of our script, magazine and newspaper feature writing in the early morning, when our mind works easily and we are fresher. We subscribe for almost every moving picture publication and take time to read almost everything printed in them. We formerly would lie awake in bed plotting a script, but as it is not conducive to rest, we eliminated that habit, although some very good ideas have been elaborated in this manner and we have frequently jotted down a story in the middle of the night, rising from bed to do it. We keep a record of all our literary work and can ascertain promptly when a manuscript was completed, where submitted and where sold and the price paid therefor. We also keep a file of all stories of releases and their titles, consequently we do not duplicate titles or stories. In conclusion, we subscribe for and take time to read The Bookman, The Literary Digest and the majority of the first-class magazines We also are proud of our library, which contains 1,000 volumes. We notice some unusual coincidences. In a recent issue of the Cosmopolitan, Mr. Alfred Henry Lewis has a "Wolfville" story in which the principal situation, a burlesque "Surrender of Cornwallis," reminded us strikingly of the same idea utilized fifty years ago by the humorist Artemus Ward. We also read a recent two-reel film release dealing with newspaper life that reminded us strikingly of a Saturday Evening Post story of two years ago. However, these things will unconsciously happen.

Some Old Ones

Some of the film companies are turning to the old plays for comedy. We see the old English comedy, "Box and Cox," has been released, and suppose that "Slasher and Crasher" will come next. There must indeed be a dearth of good comedy, when these old ones are resurrected.

Universal Scenario Department

The Universal script department, according to a statement of the officers, has been entirely reorganized. Lincoln J. Carter, author of blood-and-thunder melodramas of a bygone day, has been engaged to write "dope" and will revamp those sterling old sawmill and train-wrecking plots of "The Fast Mail," "The Heart of Chicago," "Under the Dome," etc. You've all seen 'em. They undoubtedly will be toned down considerably for the screen. According to the latest statement to writers, the minimum price for a script will be $25 for a one-reel story, "with a graduated scale upward, varying according to excellence of plot, perfection of technique and strength and novelty of the story." The announcement is made that hereafter the name of the author will appear in connection with the picture as a finished product. With twenty-one companies in the field, the Universal demands a wide diversity of plot and story. Hints to writers are given as follows: "The various producing organizations are distributed throughout the North, South, East and West, and scenarios requiring scenes typical of any part of the United States or Panama can be utilized. Bright, snappy comedies, virile dramas of Eastern and Western environment, military and cowboy comedies and dramas are among the principal requirements of the company. Particularly for the Western organization are desired one, two and three-reel scenarios, requiring casts with large ensembles of Indians, cowboys and miners. For the Eastern companies comedies and dramas with a majority of interior settings, together with split-reel comedies, are in demand. The stipulation is made that each plot be submitted in regular scenario form only, typewritten on ordinary publishers' "copy" paper, and accompanied by a synopsis not exceeding three hundred words, and including the essential points of the plot, clearly and concisely described. In no instance will an unoriginal scenario be accepted unless the author admits the source from which it is taken, nor will consideration be given to an infringement upon a copyright book, magazine or play. As a part of the new plan authors' estimates of the financial worth of his individual productions may be included with the script, and a price will be figured with that stipulated sum as a basis."

Some Markets Named

Here are some of the moving picture concerns in the market for scripts They are dependable manufacturers. It is unnecessary here to explain the groups the manufacturers are each affiliated with. This is not of prime interest to the writers. A study of the released film stories of the companies, found in the News, will give an idea of the class of story to submit to the respective concerns. Always enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope with your script and do not write personal letters to the editors. Address the concerns "Care Editorial Department."

SIMPLEX INSTALLED IN UNIVERSITY OF MISSOURI

The University of Missouri, of Columbia, Mo., has just purchased a Simplex Projector through the Kansas City Machine & Supply Company, 813 Walnut street, Kansas City, Mo.

The number of high-class educational institutions and theatrical houses which have recently purchased the Simplex Projector speaks very well for that make of machine.

PICTURE MUSIC

Ernst Luz

The February issue of the New Music Review, published by the H. W. Gray Company, agents for Novello & Co., limited, of England, publishes among its editorials an abstract of an article on "The Art of Moving Picture Playing" which appeared in the New Bedford Standard, an unknown publication to me.

To say the least, it can be considered poor comedy for a musical journal, whose motto should be the uplift of the musical art, and I might very properly mention a thought here of possible value to the publishers of a great number of musical journals, that if their motto be the betterment and advancement of good music in America, their efforts should be aimed at such points where the most good could be done. Furthermore, it is not an art to ridicule or criticize, but it does require genius to correct an evil. To reproduce the above mentioned article here would be a waste of valuable space, but it was evidently written by one who is familiar with the biographical gossip of musical journals, yet I would suggest that he inform himself as to what constitutes a dramatic work in music. After knowing this he will not need to be told what works are entirely based on lyrics.

He also states that there is no ideal union of music, drama and painting, and goes on citing incidents wherein he accompanied the pictures in like manner as would have done credit to Puccini, Verdi, Wagner, Meyerbeer, etc., and was severely criticized by both audience and manager, and concludes by saying that his harmonic scheme is as modern as any excepting that of M. A. Schönberg.

Had the aforesaid article not appeared under the caption "Art of Moving Picture Playing," I am sure I would have passed it by unnoticed, for, as I said before, it is not good comedy, has no musical value, and is far from educational. The picture at the present time requires no Wagners, Meyerbeers, etc., but is creating a great field for originality of more musical value to the art of music than any previous conception of public entertainment, and one that will not only be more universally appreciated, but will lay the foundation for making the American public more appreciative of that which is better in music, at the same time inciting an ambition within students toward a more thorough study of the art, knowing that after mastering the art there is a greater possible public to appreciate their efforts and that they will not be thrown upon the bounty of patrons and patronesses for their livelihood and opportunities to show their accomplishments.

Would it not be a great advance step for the art of music were it possible to have a medium whereby the public at a very small cost would find it possible to hear the better music under circumstances which would conclusively prove to them its thought value as well as rhythmical value?

We may contend that we have grand opera, philharmonic societies, recitals, etc., but experience has taught us that we cannot hope to reach the public at large in this manner, for it requires an intermediary whereby the public will be trained by degrees, eventually reverting to the financial benefit of these greater and more advanced portrayals of music. It is common knowledge that the theatre music is deteriorating, and it is gratifying to note that the theatre in general is suffering.

I can see no field offering greater opportunities for the gradual training of the musical ear than the picture play properly accompanied by music, it being understood that the picture should be based upon some serious thought or moral, and the music intelligently placed. While the eye is being entertained and the mental faculties developed, the musical ear is being trained. Not unsimilar to taking a bad-tasting medicine in pill form, beautifully sugar coated. It is of course understood that you cannot use consecutive fifths (as was done by the picture player of the New Bedford Standard), even if Puccini did use them, because it is common knowledge that they are distasteful to the ear, for the reason that the ear is required to add the third which is omitted and necessary to what is known as a triad, which is always sugested by the open fifth, and is a bad medium for cultivating an untrained ear.

To the many musical journals it would not be amiss to suggest that were they inclined to be constructive and not destructive, they could find a very interesting study in looking upon the screen when some good picture is being projected, with a view of ascertaining the musical possibilities. I am sure the majority would soon be convinced, as I am, that there is no other medium whereby the American public can be musically advanced to near equal it. Remember that I say "Go see the picture." You don't necessarily need to listen to the music, for I will tell you what is evidently a secret to the author, who is quoted from in the New Music Review, viz.: "There is no moving picture music." At the most, there is some suggestive playing to the picture, which suggestion is more often dictated by titles, and moving picture people claim nothing more.

It has been my pleasure to discuss some of the possibilities of the musical film with musicians of note, and in all instances the ultimate opinion of all has been a credit to the picture showing merit. We have all read the many stories telling us of the romantic, mental or other influences casting a spell upon our old masters, during which they found it possible to compose their masterpieces, and those of us who play have all passed through a state of conjecture as to what sentimental, romantic or other thoughts influenced the composition of those musical works which we know will live in our hearts forever. The good picture play is nothing more nor less than an uninterrupted thought, for its successful projection entirely depends on perfect quietude. This in itself creates an ideal condition for the rendition of music, and it requires but an intelligent placing of music to the picture to convey to the masses the moral value of music as well as the good influences it will create when it is accompanied by a suggested thought, which can be accomplished in no more perfect way than in a union of the picture and music.

If you are nursing an old sore as regards the pictures, bury it, for while there are still some pictures released which are not commendable, I can assure all that no industry has made such advance strides heretofore as have been noticed by myself in both selection of subjects and the staging and working out of the moral thought in the present pictures, all of which is an advance step toward better music.

Even if we do not publish all the letters received commending our efforts in this department, I want to assure all that we highly appreciate them and they are the prior incentive to our endeavors for striving to help picture players under present conditions, as well as in future better conditions, which we are always endeavoring to create. When writing, give us some of your beneficial experiences, which we will be only too glad to publish, as our wish is to continue this department in educational manner, which leaves us very little room for anything else. We have before us a letter from George L. Hamrick, long-time director of The Montgomery, Atlanta, Ga., which is known as the handsomest picture house in the South and maintains a genuine picture orchestra. Take note of how he handles it and benefit by it. In his letter he says:

> I was never satisfied until I played the picture with the most appropriate numbers from my repertoire. I had the pit lights attached to a switch and connected to the middle pedal on the piano, from which, with several signals, I was enabled to have the orchestra seque from one number to another with almost no interruption whatsoever.
> I have made a set of rubber stamps with the letters A, B, C, etc., encireled thus (A), which I have stamped through all my numbers, thus enabling me to use any excerpt from any number I wish.

The above commends itself and there is little for me to say, knowing that Mr. Hamrick has equipped himself in a way that assures him of good results. I might say that unless your pit is very low, a buzz or two might be an improvement on flashing the lights, which might attract the attention of the audience to a greater extent than a muffled buzz, and more different signals can be conveniently used with the buzzer.

Watch these columns for your other information, as I am starting a picture music thematic department this week, which I hope will be of benefit to all.

To the many inquiries regarding numbers suitable for piano to play between reels in States wherein an intermission between each picture is required by law, I would state that I will also embody these facts in my thematic explanations of musical numbers which will hereafter appear in these columns. For those who desire something different than the usual picture music for such playing, I would suggest a subscription to the Etude, a musical journal published by the Theo. Presser Company, 1712 Chestnut street, Philadelphia, Pa., which each month contains beautiful numbers of all grades and many of which can also be used for pictures. I do not know as to whether these numbers are later orchestrated or not. In addition to good music, you will find the Etude very educational, for a very small part of its reading matter is given to musical gossip.

MIRACLE MUSIC: No. 1. Choral. An excellent number for church scenes or religious settings. No. 2. Processional. No. 4. Diabolical Music. When played faster can be used for heavy agitato. No. 6. Hunting Chorus. No. 7. Semi-Plaintive. Excellent for portrayal of regret, sorrow, or lamentation. No. 9. Vision creating fear. No. 11. Agitato. No. 12. Semi-Plaintive. 13. Pastorale. No. 14. An excellent Valse Lento. A good theme number for female leads in pictures of court intrigue. Also an excellent pathetic number when intervening action is not heavy. No. 15. Semi-Plaintive. No. 16. Mysterioso and agitato effect. No. 17. Heavy Mysterioso. No. 18. A Valse Lento relief number. Short. No. 20. Excellent descriptive number for ancient or court dramas. No. 21. First and last movements are the best plaintive themes I know. There is no better agitato movement than the second movement of this number. No. 23. An excellent descriptive number of semi-pathetic nature. No. 24. Light hurry. No. 26. An excellent descriptive number wherein action is hurried. No. 27. Heavy mysterioso. No. 33. Excellent ending for picture of plaintive theme or story. No. 34. Hurry. Storm. Battle. Tumult. No. 36. Descriptive number for romantic or love scenes. No. 40. Slightly difficult, but very good for battle scenes, especially those of ancient setting. No. 44. No better death scene music. No. 46. An excellent devotional number. The proper effects in all these numbers are obtained by playing them slowly, which, together with their simplified arrangement for piano, is a great help in their rendition.

The score contains: No. 1. Choral, by Mendelssohn. No. 2. Solemn March, by Handel. No. 7 Seasons "June," by Tschaikowski. No. 14. Valse Triste, by J. Sibelius. No. 18. Serenade, by J. Drigo. No. 20. Arragonaise, from "Le Cid," by J. Massenet. No. 21. Prelude, by J. Rachmaninoff. No. 23. Chanson Sans Paroles, by Tschaikowski. No. 26. Tarantelle, by Arditi. No. 36. Serenade, by C. Chaminade. No. 40. Hall of the Mountain King, from "Peer Gynt," by Grieg. No. 44. Ase's Death, from "Peer Gynt," by Grieg. No. 46. Melody of Peace, by Carroll Martin. Orchestrations suitable to the above numbers can be obtained from Carl Fischer, Music Publisher, 48-54 Cooper Square, New York City, with the exception of No. 14, which is published by Breitkopf & Hartel, 24 West Twentieth street, New York City. This piano score can be obtained for 50 cents, postage prepaid, at this office or from the New York Film Company, Room 1108, 145 West Forty-fifth street, New York City. A quantity of these scores have been ordered and shipped to the Shaftesbury Feature Film Company, Ltd., of England, who produce the same film in the British Dominion under the title of "Sister Beatrice."

Two Excellent Novelettes

GHOST DANCE, by Cora Salisbury. An excellent, as well as pleasing, number. Good for the musical portrayal of ghost, witch or other scenes of mysterious nature, during which there is a suggestion of plotting on the screen. Also good in Arabian or Oriental pictures wherein the plotting action is well defined. Has an especially beautiful and mystifying effect when the film is tinted by a color bath. Should be played in slow tempo. M. M. dotted quarter, 72, is a good tempo from which you can get excellent toning effects.

RAIN DROPS, by Chas. B. Brown. An excellent number for portrayal of children's frolics. Also a good descriptive number for frivolous action leading up to serious thought portrayals in pictures containing no violent action. Is a very light and melodious number. Is very flexible as to tempo and can be hurried without marring the composition. Both above numbers are in six-eighths tempo and are published by Will Rossiter, Music Publisher, 136 West Lake street, Chicago, Ill.

Note.—When ordering music from publishers, kindly mention Moving Picture News.

KINEMACOLOR OFFERINGS

A marked improvement is being noted in Kinemacolor productions of the dramatic order. The Kinemacolor scenics are such as may never be excelled in the world of photography, and it may be because so much more is expected from this method than from black and white that the critics have felt that Kinemacolor dramatic and comedy productions were in need of "fixing." However, one of this week's offerings, "As the Candle Burns," has exceptional merit. The sentiment of the picture is beautiful, and it is indeed an exquisite piece of work. Double exposure plays a large part in this production, which is the story of a dear old lady who is represented as sitting with a lighted candle beside her, looking through the contents of a trunk in which have been locked away the relics of long ago. As she takes each piece of clothing, and each trinket from its place in the trunk, a vision of other days in which has figured that particular article passes before her—her childhood, her courtship, her wedding day, and, last of all, a visit to the grave of he beside whom she had walked life's rugged path. Beautiful and touching are these scenes, made more lovely by the Kinemacolor method.

"The New Butler" and "His Lordship's Merry Jest" are also worthy of mention, especially the latter; and "Winter Sports in the Swiss Alps" is an irresistible bit of life and color. "Eggs and Egg-speriments" is an amusing bit of clever trick photography.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION OF GREATER NEW YORK, INC.,

LOCAL No. 1

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Secretary-Treasurer—Robert Levy.
Recording Secretary—George Epstein
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—Ralph Knaster.

Telephone—Stuyvesant 572.
Office—133 Third Avenue.

The Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Inc., Local No. 1, held their entertainment and ball last Monday night, February 10, 1913, at Palm Garden, Fifty-eighth street and Lexington avenue. There were more than three thousand people attended and many more clamored to gain admittance, but were turned away.

It was beyond doubt the greatest success both socially and financially of any moving picture operators' organization in this part of the country. If you were in the city at the time you should not have missed it.

Were you there? No? Then you are one of those misguided mortals who must be told what happened, and then, miserable wretch, after thou hast been told, turn over and hide your head in shame.

But, oh! me! oh! my! what a classy bunch those operators looked. every mother's son was togged out a la Fifth avenue, and, believe me, Horace, Reggie Vanderbilt's crowd didn't have anything on 'em when it comes to class.

The boys made up their minds that the one big night must be made noticeable, and they certainly made good. And as for the guests, well, just read, and then you will realize if you haven't done so up to this moment, what you have overlooked.

First and foremost, of course, came John Bunny, and oh! what a riot he was; why every move of his was watched and loudly cheered, and when he stepped out on the ballroom floor for the grand march, then you ought to hear it: why a conquering hero's return was but a whisper as compared to the roar of approval that came from the people in the hall. And right here let it be said that, if Brother Bunny doubts the warm place he holds in the hearts of both pictureplay fans and operators, he had the proof there and then.

Then came the queen of the evening, Pearl White, and the boys were certainly proud of her, for this graceful little nymph of the screen was the hit with everybody, for she was jolly and friendly to everyone, and a good mixer, never missing anything that came her way, and she can rest assured that the boys of Local No. 1 will never forget the little darling, bless her!

And as for the galaxy of photo stars there were Jane Fearnley, of the Imp; Octavia Handworth, of the Pathé Freres American Company; Harry Benham and William Russell of the Thanhouser; Chester Barnett, of the Crystal; Hugh Mack, the popular fat boy comedian, of the Vitagraph; Darwin Karr, of the Solax, and he certainly made a hit with his number when he was called upon to entertain the audience. One of the most highly interesting and entertaining acts presented was given by Mr. Ralph Ince and company, of the Vitagraph players, including Mrs. Maurice and Mr. Mason, in the playlet presented by them, entitled "The Seventh Son." During the action of the play Mr. Ralph Ince gave a faithful and artistic representation of our martyred President, Abraham Lincoln. The character of the Mother pleading for her son's life, was ably and sympathetically rendered by Mrs. Maurice. The Military Aid to the President was played by Mr. Mason in an artistic manner. During the entire rendering of the play the audience was held spellbound by the characters and the dramatic situations involved in the playlet, and at its conclusion, not a dry eye among the auditors was to be seen owing to the stirred emotions. Three curtains and three bows at the conclusion of one of the most artistic acts ever presented before any audience. Long may they live.

Crane Wilbur, of Pathé Company, was present, and made himself very popular by his genial good nature. We must not forget Trixie Bennett, leading lady of the Victor Company, who tripped the light fantastic 'til the early morn. Mr. William Shay, of the Imp Company, renewed many acquaintances in the flesh, who became acquainted during the counterfeit of the screen. Department of Water Supply, Gas and Electricity was ably represented by Inspectors Timothy, Quinn, Cooper, Woods and Spears, a mighty five. The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Greater New York delegation included President Samuel Trigger, Secretary Bauernfreund, and at least twenty-five others, whose names cannot be recalled at this moment, but all proved themselves good fellows at fraternizing with the operators in good fellowship, and from what President Samuel Trigger said, they had a "corking" good time. The following from the Universal Company and Weekly were: Messrs. J. Brandt, Saunders and Goldstein, who really lived up to the title "Universal," and were right on the job with bells on. The M. P. machine manufacturers each had working exhibits, the Motiograph, under direction of Mr. Clark; the Powers 6A, direction of Mr. Ross; the Standard direction of Mr. Morrison, and the Simplex, under direction of Mr. Frank Cannock. Each machine was ably demonstrated and showed an equal number of independent and licensed films to delighted beholders. F. W. Hochstetter, our honorary member of "Pilgrims' Progress" fame, was right to home with the boys without a "Bunyan," or a bun on.

The Moving Picture News was well represented by Brother Alfred H. Saunders, editor; also Mr. William Petingale, Miss I. A. McDonald and R. J. Knaster. Among the artists already mentioned on the program were Miss Alice Gardner, Harry Montgomery, West and Simmons, Darwin Karr, Ralph Ince and company and others. Stage direction under Brother J. A. Le Roy.

The performance ran smoothly, without a hitch, and compared with any standard program.

Brother John Bunny stepped upon the stage to address the audience thus:

Ladies and Gentlemen: No doubt you expect to hear me give you a monologue, some of my old jokes, etc., but I am not appearing before you to-night as an actor, but as a member of the union and a union man. Our organization is a young one, but it is growing, and as you see to-night, it is a successful one. Great credit is given to our leader, for indeed all organizations must have a good leader to guide them toward success. The brothers are aware that they owe much to him for their standing, and they show their sincerity to him. I am proud to be one of the members of this union. As I have seen my boy grow up, so I can see this organization growing stronger every day. (Calling the president.) This is our leader and president, Robert Goldblatt. The brothers wish to show their sincerity to you by presenting you with this loving cup, and may God spare you many happy years.

Brother Goldblatt then thanked the boys for their gift, and told of the progress of the union. He also had a few remarks to make regarding the struggling garment workers, and collected in the neighborhood of $40 in the loving cup, and the money will be sent to the Garment Workers' Union.

Brother Ralph Knaster, business representative, presented the organization with a beautiful banner bearing the emblem of Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1. In all, many happy hours were spent. Everyone enjoyed the grand music rendered by the famous Lemlein Hippodrome Band.

THE OPERATORS' BALL

Poem by Ralph J. Knaster

The moving picture operators and moving picture stars,
Arrived at Palm Garden in taxi and touring cars;
They gathered there to celebrate as guests of Local No. 1,
And then engaged in dancing 'til the rising of the sun.
At nine o'clock to everyone's delight.
A pretty maid entered, all shouted here's Pearl White.
She looked the darling that she is, her hair not done in crimps,
And by her side Jane Fearnley, the leading lady of the Imps;
Octavia Handworth, her other chum, feeling just as gay,
The pretty leading lady in films of the American Pathe.
Just then appeared upon the screen a picture, oh, so funny!
And into the hall there entered our Honorary Brother Bunny.
They say no one likes a fat man, but he had come from Mars,
Beloved by all picturedom, and the most popular picture stars.
Three thousand voices cheered, then came silence not a wince,
For on the stage they saw Lincoln's days and Lincoln was Ralph Ince.

BIG FILM SERVICE CONTRACT

The firms of Moss & Brill and Cunningham & Fluegelman have secured from the Kinemacolor Company of America the exclusive right to present natural color motion pictures for one year in the Boroughs of Manhattan, the Bronx, and Brooklyn, with the exception of the territory in Manhattan bounded on the north by Fifty-ninth street and on the south by Fourteenth street. The consideration involved is $250,000, and the contract calls for a three-reel service changed twice a week. The territory between Fourteenth and Fifty-ninth streets, Manhattan, has Kinemacolor at William Morris' Wonderland and at the Carnegie Lyceum, the first mentioned showing the regular Kinemacolor service of comedies, dramas, educational, etc., and the Carnegie Lyceum showing "The Making of the Panama Canal" and "Actual Scenes of the Balkan War." A special stipulation in the contract permits the Kinemacolor Company of America to continue service to the Children's Theatre, on top of the Century Theatre at Sixty-second street and Central Park West.

Until very recently the Kinemacolor Company of America made no efforts to extend the film service of its natural color motion pictures, feeling it best to wait until it was fully prepared to offer a service which in quality and variety would compare favorably with the best, even when the overwhelming advantage of natural color in the pictures was let entirely out of consideration. Feeling this point reached, Kinemacolor was advertised in a few of the trade papers and the New York offices, which occupy a whole floor of the Mecca Building at 1600 Broadway, were at once flooded with letters of inquiry.

The Kinemacolor organization has been rapidly increased to meet this flood of business. Speaking of the steps taken to handle the rush of new business, Henry J. Brock, president of the Kinemacolor Company of America, said:

"Already we have opened branch offices at Cincinnati and Boston and will follow these with offices at Chicago and St. Louis, and so on until the entire country is covered. Each branch office will carry a complete duplicate stock of all Kinemacolor reels, including dramas, comedies, travel and educational; in fact, a duplicate of everything made by the Kinemacolor Company of America and a duplicate of everything made by the Natural Color Kenematograph Company, Ltd., of England, which will appeal to American audiences. We now have five companies in California producing plays, and the Kinemacolor Fashion Films, taken in New York, and showing the latest Parisian styles months in advance, have proven unusually strong with exhibitors. Of our educational and travel reels I need hardly speak. I cannot help, however, a reference to the business done at the Carnegie Lyceum where our color-films of "The Making of the Panama Canal" and "Actual Scenes of the Balkan War" for the past six weeks have been playing daily at prices of from 25 cents to $1.50 and, doing a good business at the start, have increased that business each week until it has gotten to the point where many dollars are turned away from the box office each week because we haven't sufficient seating capacity."

FRANK SPEAIGHT AND DICKENS

We spent several delightful hours on the afternoons of the 4th and 6th inst., listening to the rendition of the story of "Alfred Jingle, Esq.," and a "Tale of Two Cities," from the writings of Charles Dickens by Mr. Frank Speaight, who is called "England's greatest interpreter of Dickens." There is no doubt but that he deserves to be heartily congratulated on his able portrayal of the numerous characters in the recital of the above themes.

His recital of the self-important Alfred Jingle, Esq., was excellent; one could imagine oneself in the presence of that interesting character, whose assurance was so overwhelming as to compel you to submit to his dictation in spite of any doubt that might arise in your mind as to the truth of his statements.

The whole dialogue was presented in such a manner as to place one amongst the real characters; you were living with them; as it brought to the mental vision the scenes portrayed, and in such a pleasing manner; nothing was overdone, graceful, and a musical, well-modulated voice; a good memory, and a thorough understanding of the subject, combined to make the time pass in oblivion to everything else.

The recital of the characters in the "Tale of Two Cities" left little to be desired; the charms and chivalry of those days were ably brought out in striking contrast to the present.

The grand character of Sydney Carton and his manifold ability, and otherwise, were ably rendered; the grace and sweet charm of Lucie Manette, and the courtly behavior of Mr. Jarvis Lorry, and the old Doctor and Charles Darney, in fact all the essential points were elucidated very cleverly, making the afternoon one to be long remembered. It was one of those delightful afternoons that we love to dwell upon; it brought to our memory days of long ago, and what real love means—a love for a pure woman and child, a love that conquers self; that makes us forget everything but the doing of good deeds.

All lovers of Charles Dickens should hear Mr. Frank Speaight's recitals; they will be well repaid and will learn much from his clever rendition.

The J. B. Pond Lyceum Bureau are to be congratulated upon bringing out such men as the above, and giving such splendid educational subjects as in the form of lectures by "Buffalo" Jones "Lassoing Wild Animals in Africa." We have commented so favorably on "Buffalo" Jones and his work that we feel we can say very little more. This Lyceum brings another lecturer to the front in the shape of Angus Hamilton, F.R.G.S., an old friend of ours whom we knew in the days of the Boer War, and who is well known as being with General Baden-Powell at Mafeking. From here he went to the war with China at the time of the Boxer rising, and lately as being a prisoner in the Bulgarian camp during the Turkish War. He comes to the Carnegie Hall on Wednesday, February 19th. Such educational lectures as these will do much to advance the art of Cinematography, and all of our readers who can should attend this series of lectures

SOME DOCTOR

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Punch Release)

THE village of X——— was disgustingly healthful. It was situated on a river both beautiful and useful. The fish which came from there were shipped to many places. The industry brought many of the laboring classes to the village, and the beauty brought many Summer visitors and many families who made their home there the whole year. The place was large enough to keep one from feeling bored, yet small enough to give one a feeling of personal possession.

When Tom Green finished his medical education there naturally arose the question of where to practice—or try to. Some of his friends had said, "Go to a city, by all means. It may be harder to establish a practice, but when you do you've got something worth while"; others had said, "If you go to a city you'll starve to death while you're waiting," and they reminded him of the mule whose master was training him to do without eating, but when the mule was almost trained, he died.

Finally Green's chum came to him and told him a great secret. It ran something like this: "I had intended to settle in X———, but I've changed my mind and have decided to practice in my own town. X——— is a dandy place for a doctor. There are a lot of fishing people and so, of course, accidents and sickness among the children and all that. And then, besides, there are a lot of well-to-do people there, too, and you can charge them a decent fee I thought I'd let you in on this, old man, before I told anybody else about it. It's a fine opening."

So Dr. Green went to X——— with his hopes high. He found a nice office overlooking the beautiful river, and he spent much time sitting by his window watching it flow by.

When the young man had been in the town a few weeks he began to feel so well that he became suspicious. He was not looking for health-giving breezes.

The weeks passed and so did the young doctor's dollars. Now and then someone came into his office because of a fish-hook in his hand or a cold in his head. So far, so good, but it takes a number of colds and fish-hooks to pay a man's rent. Green began to think not only that the place was healthful, but that an especially benign Providence watched over the village and protected it from accidents.

One morning when the doctor was just settling down for his day's rest, a knock sounded upon the door. With joy in his heart he opened it and stood face to face with his landlord.

"Good-morning, Mr. Bush; come in," he said, as pleasantly as possible. "Have a chair here, where you can get a view of the river."

"It's not a view of the river I came for, Doctor Green. But I must say it's a very nice view, and I think it ought to be paid for. I can't afford to give it away."

"Yes, of course, I know. I'll call around and see you in a day or two."

"No, you won't!" thundered the landlord. "You'll pay me right now or out you go. I'm sorry, but I've got to do it. If you can't pay for this place, somebody else can."

Dr. Green became very dignified. "Of course I can pay it, if you will only wait on my convenience for a short while. I am expecting a check in every mail."

"Expecting a check?" grinned Mr. Bush. "Oh, yes, I've heard of such."

"Well?"

"Well, if you haven't got the money, you haven't. I'll wait until to-morrow evening, and then I'll call again. I'm sorry to do it, but if you cannot pay me, I'll have to ask you to leave, for there are others who can. Good-morning, Dr. Green."

When the door had closed the doctor sank into the chair by the window. For a moment he looked at the river moving so steadily and so peacefully by. He almost wished he could throw himself into the clear water and forget, so troubled was he. His head sank back upon the chair and his eyes closed.

Suddenly he sat up with a start. The river might help him, but not in the way he had thought. In a few seconds he was hunting in his closet for something.

An old suit of clothes was not a hard thing to find in the doctor's closet, and very soon he had one waiting to play its part in relieving his financial embarrassment.

The next thing to be done he proceeded to do. Sitting at his desk, he picked up a pen and dipped it in the ink. Before he had written a word on the clean, white sheet before him he laid down the pen and took a pencil. Then, searching among the papers before him he found a scrap of half-soiled writing paper. With this before him, he sat thinking for a long time before he wrote.

That night, when darkness had completely covered the village, the doctor, with a bundle under one arm, proceeded to take a walk along the river. When he returned both arms hung freely at his sides.

The doctor's dreams that night were fitful. Imps of varying shapes and sizes peeped at him from every corner. The landlord, chief among them, thrust him into the street with a three-pronged fork. The old suit of clothes danced around the room, waving the empty sleeves and legs and turning the empty pockets inside out.

All this went on the whole night. Consequently there was no wonder that the sound of hurrying feet woke young Dr. Green early in the morning.

"Where are they?" asked a voice excitedly.

The doctor sat up in bed. He did not hear the answer, for the people passed too rapidly.

Another question, "Who found them?" and this time the answer came, "A fisherman, they say."

The doctor jumped out of bed and hurried into his clothes. By leaning from his window and looking up the river he could see a crowd on the bank. "Good!" he exclaimed. "I believe it's working fine. It must be time for me to appear."

"What is wrong?" he asked someone on the outskirts of the crowd, when he had reached it, and trying not to show too much interest

"We are afraid somebody is drowned. There are some clothes left in a very suspicious-looking pile."

"Has anyone examined them for marks of identification?" was the next question.

"Oh, yes, everybody has examined them, but nothing has been found."

"Dear, dear, that's too bad," murmured the doctor, with feeling.

"Say, fellows, this is a doctor; don't you think he ought to have a look?" The man asked the question of those near him.

"Sure," exclaimed one of the others, and several of them moved aside for Dr. Green to enter.

He picked up the clothes and looked them over. "Pretty poor looking," he said. "I suppose you have looked through all the pockets. There's no use my looking."

"Oh, yes, look, Doctor," someone cried, "you might find something."

So the doctor looked very thoroughly. At first nothing was found. Then, when he, apparently, stumbled upon the half-hidden watch pocket, a little paper was brought forth. The crowd pressed close around while the doctor read:

"I am a poor outcast afflicted with smallpox. I die rather than contaminate others.

"Despairingly,

"James Smith."

A cry went up from the crowd as the word "smallpox" was read. Many of them had touched the clothes and all had been near them.

"Oh, Doctor, you must vaccinate us at once," cried one woman.

"Yes."
"Yes."
"You must."
"Come to your office now."

The crowd surged round Dr. Green and literally carried him along. The young medical heart beat rapidly with happiness.

All day long his office was crowded. Young and old, male and female came. Tom Green could scarcely keep from singing with joy.

When evening came and the office was empty, Dr. Green opened the drawer of his desk and smiled. Then he began to count. One thousand and forty-two dollars —more than he had made since he left medical school. Now let old Bush come if he wanted to.

Dr. Green walked to the window. "I am very thankful to you," he said to the river. "If it hadn't been for you I couldn't have done it. Don't let James Smith out of there. Poor James! I feel almost sorry for his fate."

There was a knock at the door. Dr. Green grinned.

"Come in."

"Good-evening, Doctor."

"Why, how do you do, Mr. Bush. I'm very glad to see you. My money came and I wanted to be sure to pay you to-night."

"Ump! Your check came, did it? They don't, usually."

Dr. Green handed the landlord a handful of bills. As Bush counted them he said, "What's all this I hear about a smallpox scare? I've been in the country all day and when I came back everybody began to tell me long-winded stories about the whole town being exposed to smallpox."

"Well, someone found a suit of clothes on the river bank," explained the doctor, "and there was a note inside which said the owner had had smallpox and had committed suicide. The people handled the clothes and of course they were exposed. Even those who did not handle them are in some danger, of course."

"Do you think there's likely to be an epidemic?"

"Oh, I hope not. A great many have come to me to be vaccinated to-day. It was lucky I had plenty of serum on hand that was fresh. It was quite providential."

Mr. Bush handled the paper-knife uneasily for a moment.

"Do you think I had better be vaccinated, Doctor?" he asked finally.

"Why, you must suit yourself, Mr. Bush. I do not wish to make vaccination compulsory. Besides, I have very little serum left and someone who might need it more than you do might come in. Perhaps you'd better not. Take good care of yourself and probably you'll be all right."

"Probably I'll be all right! I want to know it!" yelled Mr. Bush.

"Well, the serum is quite valuable."

"What will you charge to vaccinate me? We'll put this thing right on a business basis."

"Well—a, I think I couldn't do it for less than ten dollars, Mr. Bush."

"Ten dollars!"

"Well, you see, the serum is low and more people may come in to-morrow. I'll have to send away and——"

"All right! It's robbery, but do it," blustered Mr. Bush.

"Oh, no, not unless you feel perfectly——"

"Go ahead, go ahead," insisted the man, as he began to take off his coat.

"Is that all?" he asked, when Dr. Green had finished.

"Yes, that is all. I don't anticipate much trouble from it, as your blood is probably in good condition.

"Well, here's your money. I'd advise you to put it aside towards next month's rent."

A little later Tom Green sat writing to his chum.

"I've had one prosperous day, if I never have another in your old dead-alive town," he began. Then he told the story of the clothes.

In the last paragraph he said: "Any feeling of sore conscience I put entirely onto you. I couldn't starve, you know. But don't feel too bad about it, old man, for I didn't have a drop of serum in the place."

PUNCH CHANGES ITS POLICY

Beginning with the release of Thursday, March 6th, the Punch Company will desert the field of slap-stick comedy and produce nothing but high-class comedy-drama. The demand for refined comedy with a real plot and an interesting story is greater than ever and seems to be growing continually. For this reason the Punch Company will bend all its efforts to helping to fill this demand, and the last release under its present form of production will be on Thursday, February 27th, when "Bobby's Bum Bomb" and "Tracked to Florida," which have already been announced, will appear according to schedule.

Mr. J. V. Ritchey, general manager of the Carlton Motion Picture Laboratories, is now in Jacksonville, Fla., personally superintending the change in the nature of the Punch releases.

GREAT EASTERN FILM MANUFACTURING CO.

Tremont street, Boston. Mass., capital, $200,000, have purchased a four-story building 30x200 in the town of Stoughton, Mass., where they will locate their manufacturing plant and studio. James A. Reid, treasurer and manager of the company is now in Jacksonville, Fla., locating winter quarters for the Great Eastern Photoplayers. This company has signed up Virginia Keatinge for leading lady. Miss Keatinge opened the College Theatre of Chicago, and was seen in Boston for two seasons with James O'Neil. She toured the United States and Australia as Kundry in "Parsifal."

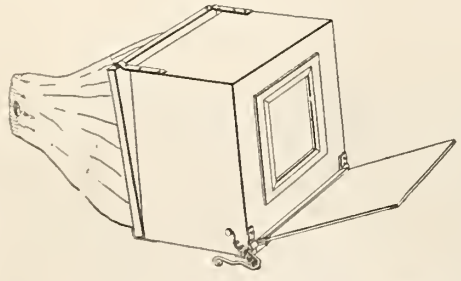
MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

IN the Patent Office, Commissioner Moore recently decided that in order to be patentable, a design must not only be new and ornamental, but there must have been in its production an exercise of the inventive faculty. While the novelty of a design must still be subjected to the test of ornament, there is no objection to the article to which the ornament relates being useful as well as ornamental, although mere features of utility alone are not sufficient to justify the grant of a design patent. Furthermore the citation of the mechanical functions of a device is no proper argument for the granting of a design patent thereon.

The Commissioner has also made a new interpretation of the term "geographical" as applied to the registration of trade-marks, holding in a recent decision that although the word "Lakeside" appears from the Postal Guide to be used to designate some seventeen post-offices in the United States, two of them even being incorporated villages, still, as none of them are well known, it is not probable that an ordinary person would regard "Lakeside" as a geographical term in the ordinary sense of the word, the presumption being that it would be regarded as fanciful by a large majority of observers. This constitutes a rather radical and liberal change in the construction of the law in this particular, which technically prohibits the registration of geographical names in the abstract as trade-marks, mainly on the theory that such names are common property, especially in so far as residents are concerned.

The Ortho Film Company, of Pittsburgh, Pa., has applied for the registration of its monogram as a trade-mark for moving picture films, negative and positive films and kinetoscopes, claiming use since November, 1910. Serial No. 59,345.



Patent No. 1,049,504, to Harry L. Mansfield and Brison Rogers, of Lucas, Kan., relates to apparatus for printing photographs, the object being to provide a simple and effective mechanism whereby prints may be made quickly and without danger of exposing them to the action of actinic rays, the device including a casing having an exposure opening in one wall, a transparent plate extending across said opening, a shutter for closing the opening, yielding means for holding the shutter in closed position, a backing detachably mounted within the casing for holding a negative against the transparent plate, said backing having an opening for the reception of sensitized material, a closure for the opening in the backing, means for fastening said closure within the opening, means for detachably securing the backing in active position within the casing, and a flexible arm receiving tube connected to one wall of the casing.

account of their availability, Dr. T. H. Weisenberg, neurologist to the Philadelphia General Hospital, has for the past five years been utilizing cinematographic films in the study of nervous diseases, and has accumulated over two miles of interesting and valuable films relating to the subject. Because the symptoms of nervous diseases are mainly characteristic movements, such as gaits, tremors, convulsions or spasms, they are particularly adapted for study by the aid of motion photography, although, according to the doctor, there is no reason why the cinematograph should not be utilized in the successful study of other types of disease. Moto-illustrations have already been employed by public health bureaus in different States, notably Louisiana, where the head of the department utilizes them in showing the menace of such diseases as smallpox, typhoid fever, etc. And for several years motion photographs have been in existence showing the movement, growth and characteristics of different types of bacilli. Furthermore, Dr. Weisenberg says we have in the moving picture a permanent record of symptoms which may be sent from place to place and reproduced at will, no matter how rare the case. Not only so, but the pictures furnish a means of diagnosis, especially in the case of certain epileptic spasms where the actual movements are very swift, but may be slowed up for recognition on the picture by lessening the speed of the film.

"I am a self-made man, I am."

"Well, I think there is one thing you needn't worry about."

"What is that?"

"Taking out a patent."—Tit-Bits.

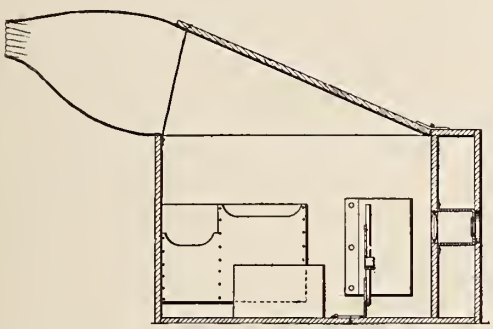
Correct. Only "new and useful" things are patentable.

Patent No. 1,049,077, to Clarence A. Goddard, of Akron, Ohio, has special relation to apparatus for producing flash lights in the making of photographs. The objects of the invention are to produce an apparatus embodying a cabinet within which the flash is produced so that the fumes incident to the flash are prevented from escaping into the room, thereby enabling the device to be used in galleries without rendering the air obnoxious to the occupants, said cabinet having a translucent front through which the light passes for making the photograph, and also a rear wall to which are secured a plurality of electric or other lights, which may be utilized for furnishing suitable light to the photographer for obtaining the necessary focus, so that when the flash occurs the subject of the picture is properly posed. A still further and primary object of this invention is to provide a magazine supply for repeated flashes, and means to receive the successive charges of flash-powder from the magazine and shift them into the cabinet from the exterior and fire them simultaneously with the opening of the shutter of the camera lens, thereby providing a device which may be repeatedly used, and one in which the certainty of operation of the device is insured with the simultaneous opening of the camera shutter, the flash used for producing the picture occurring absolutely simultaneously with the exposure of the plate.

"A Rose by Any Other Name"

Sometimes there is much in a "monicker" and other times there is nothing in a name, but the grand jury of the District of Columbia indicted William Shorts today on the charge of embezzlement and Henry Honesty on a charge of grand larceny. There was a titter in the courtroom when the indictment charging Shorts with being short in his accounts was read, and it assumed the proportions of a general laugh when Honesty was accused of stealing. Even the judge smiled.

Then someone got busy with the telephone directory and discovered that Washington has a tailor named Needle and another by the name of Sheers. It was also found that there are a couple of dentists who bear the names Butcher and Gash, and a tobacco dealer by the name of Plugge. Under the caption of "Loans" there was the name Leetch. Altogether, Washington wonders what's in a name.—New York Tribune.



Patent No. 1,049,944, to William J. Thompson, of the city, county and state of New York, relates to plate holders for cameras of the positive tintype and postal card variety, in which the metallic plates and buttons are held in position with relation to the lens by a magnet, while the postal cards are held by hand on an upright support, side notches in which act as guides in positioning the sensitized plates on cards. Receptacles are provided for the storage of postal cards, different sizes of tin plates and buttons, and manipulation is effected through a light-tight sleeve.

Two Wayne County (Mich.) Circuit Court divorce cases are entitled, respectively, Billidoux vs. Billidoux, and Kiss vs. Kiss—a natural sequence and indicative of the briefness of lip service.

In behalf of inventors generally, the Patent Law Association objects to the compulsory license feature of the Oldfield bill, now before Congress, on the grounds that it "tends to stifle invention, takes away the conclusive control of the invention, adds to the difficulty of disposing of patents," and prevents the inventor from "getting employment to work out inventions for a manufacturer." The Association also claims that "it would be difficult and frequently impossible for a court to fix a proper license fee." Furthermore, it is:

"Unfair to the man who is attempting to develop a patent but lacks funds.

"Puts him at the mercy of a rival whose factory is more favorably located.

"A powerful rival could undersell, even at a loss, for the sake of putting him out of business.

"Destroys the protection afforded by the ownership of several alternative patents.

"Induces the manufacturing of crude earlier forms of invention instead of improving it.

"Can be used by the unscrupulous as a means of coercion and oppression.

"Injects an element of uncertainty and instability in trade.

"Small manufacturers could not compete with richer ones."

Registration has been granted Sigmond M. Rosin, of Philadelphia, Pa., for the trade-mark "ROTOGRAPH" for sensitized photographic papers, used since October 10, 1910. Registration No. 89,952.

Assistant Commissioner Billings, in a recent decision, holds that the words "bona fide" were properly refused registration as a trade-mark, since these words indicate to the average purchaser that the goods upon which they are placed are genuine, and the mark is therefore descriptive. He sustains the examiner of trade-marks in the contention that the expression "bona fide," literally translated, means "good faith," and when affixed to goods sold will clearly indicate that these goods are as represented, that is to say, genuine.

Furthermore, the contention that the aggregation of patents under single ownership is a monopoly was disposed of by the Court of Appeals of the Seventh Circuit in the case of Indiana Mfg. Co. vs J. I. Case Threshing Machine Co. (154 Fed, 365-371).

Some idea of the vast wealth of Mr. J. P. Morgan may be gathered from the fact that he employs nine lawyers, and yet never grows poor.—Kansas City Journal.

Six hundred and sixteen patents were issued this week, of which 539 were to residents of the United States, New York State leading with ninety-six patents and a registration of thirty trade-marks, etc.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of the Moving Picture News.

NOTES BY THE WAY

By De Facto

An Editor's Valedictory

The editor of the Herald published in the town of Punta Gorda, Fla., engaged in the moving picture business, and after varying experiences took leave of the same in an editorial, which for good sense, broad views and wise observations connected with the moving picture theatre, deserves to be read and pondered by all who are or who may become interested therein. His remarks as to the matters of license, and the heavy taxing of the traveling tented affairs, will be particularly appreciated by those exhibitors in small places whose business almost gets the quietus whenever the canvas outfits strike the town. De Facto suggests that exhibitors everywhere have this editorial reproduced in their local papers, as it will be helpful in disseminating proper views of the moving picture business in general. The article follows:

The Moving Picture Show

In commending the moving picture show as an enterprise that should be encouraged rather than discouraged, we have no ulterior motive—no one now connected with this paper is or ever expects to be again financially interested in a moving picture show in Punta Gorda—but such an enterprise has a value to a community that merits consideration.

Conducted upon a proper plane, it furnishes entertainment of an educational character and provides a place of amusement to which men, women and children can find pleasure in going; and this entertainment is furnished at a nominal admission fee, which will hardly make millionaires of the proprietors of such shows in towns of small population.

And this class of amusement is worth considerable to small cities that would offer attractions to winter visitors. Tourists like to have some place to go evenings, and in the absence of high-class theatricals, which the larger cities only can offer, the moving picture show is an excellent substitute.

Municipalities would do well to make the occupation tax on moving picture shows as low as possible consistent with the tax placed on other business enterprises of approximately the same income and capital investment. A low license on the moving picture show and a high tax on the traveling tented affairs would be a good policy. The former keeps the money at home and the latter takes it away.

* * * *

Isn't He Right?

Hardly anyone will be found to question the propriety and advantage of churches giving an occasional moving picture entertainment, but should churches engage in the business as a regular proposition? Many and various would be the answers pro and con to the question, but the experience and ultimatum of a certain Georgia clergyman will doubtless find hearty endorsement by many another member of the cloth who has tried the same experiment. After installing a machine in the church and giving weekly shows regularly for an extended period, and after considering the difficulties in the way of always providing the proper subjects, the more or less always-to-be-expected hostile criticisms by some members of his congregation, the meagerness of the results in the shows' actual contribution to the upbuilding of the church, he came to this deliberate conclusion: "Everyone to his business—the cobbler to his last, the merchant to his goods, the hotel man to his guests, the preacher to his preaching, and the moving picture man to his pictures."

Featuring the Whites of the Eyes.

The truest and most artistic acting upon the legitimate stage is that which approaches nearest to the natural. This applies to facial as well as to bodily expression. Take any of the greatest actors and actresses and note how carefully they conform to this proposition. And what is true of the legitimate, is equally true of the picture-play stage. Then what shall be said of those actors who appear upon the screen with eyes rolled backward to such an extent that the whites thereof are pictured to an abnormal and unnatural extent, thus detracting from the truest conception of the art of acting. This eye-rolling appears at its worst when side or profile views are taken, when to an ordinary observer the chief effort of the actors seems to be to see how much of the whites of the eyes can be shown rather than the faithful portrayal of the particular part that they are at the moment engaged in. Any single movement that impresses a mannerism upon the audience surely detracts from the act as a whole, and it is to be submitted that in picture after picture the visitor leaves the theatre only to discuss with his neighbor the extent to which this optical evil was displayed upon the screen. This being so, it would seem to be something that directors should seek to correct. No particular set of pictureplay actors can be charged with being chief sinners in this regard, for with few exceptions it is De Facto's observation that all will have to plead guilty to this unfortunate and inartistic practice.

An Offensive Picture

De Facto is seated in a large, fine theatre, a two-reel "feature" is on the screen, and these are some of the audible comments that greet his ears: "Do people come here to see such things?" "Why, it's perfectly disgusting!" "That's the worst I have ever seen." "Just look at the actions of that woman!" And what was the picture? "The Reincarnation of Karma!" And what were the actions of the leading lady that brought forth such remarks? Why, they were such as would put to shame the most shameless coochee-coochee dancer in the most abandoned "Midway" that was ever allowed to run. And so an otherwise beautiful picture was ruined by these several objectionable scenes. And the worst of it is, that they were altogether unnecessary to the proper working out and understanding of the production. "Quinetrea" could have made love to "Karma" without all those abominal contortions, which became particularly reprehensible because made without fleshings. There are sweet, dainty and fascinating ways of making love in the pictures that could have been employed and would have been wholly unobjectionable, and not have left such a bad impression of the picture. For be it understood, that while the Vitagraph people have turned out many fine, classical and worthy subjects, it remains a fact that this very bad one will linger upon the average mind and call for reprobation much longer than all the good ones that they have produced. "Father" Rock should have heard the comments of the audience and seen the chagrin of the manager of the theatre as he had to apologize to his patrons for putting on the picture, and he would have forthwith issued a "never again" mandate to his directors.

ORPHEUM THEATRE, JERSEY CITY, CHANGES TO PICTURES

Mr. Anthony Michel, operating the Orpheum Theatre, Jersey City, N. J., has abandoned stock, and is now showing high class moving pictures. Through "J. H. Hallberg, the Economizer Man," he purchased a Powers No 6A machine, Hallberg A. C. Economizer, and asbestos booth.

"QUO VADIS"

A cable dispatch from London informs us that the unique innovation of selling a feature film by auction took place at Stevens Auction Room, London, February 13th, the highest bidder obtained the copy of "Quo Vadis" for the sum of £7,500, approximately $37,500. This includes fifteen copies of the picture and exclusive rights through the British Isles. The name of the buyer was not mentioned.

ECLAIR

THE TERRIBLE DAUGHTER (Feb. 16).—"Well, I'll settle you, young lady! From today on you are just eleven years old! You shall be dressed and treated as a child since you persist in acting in such a fashion. Now, how do you like that?"

Pretty Anais was 17 and her mother, who was thinking of marriage herself, had sent the charming miss off to school, only to get reports of most undignified actions there. These childish pranks and many extravagances put an end to the school solution of her problem, and so Mrs. Dumonlin decided on the unique punishment of treating her beautiful daughter as an eleven-year-old child.

But, while at school, Anais had met young Edgar Durocher and the two had decided on marriage. That meant trouble for mother.

Well, things happen in an unusual manner in this life of ours, for, who should see Anais and fall in love with her charms but Mr. Durocher himself, Edgar's father.

The old gentleman called and made known his wishes, but Mrs. Dumonlin was astounded.

"Marry my daughter! Why, the idea's ridiculous! Why—surely, you can't be serious—she's—why, she's only eleven years old."

But Mr. Durocher didn't intend to be rejected so suddenly and he insisted on seeing the young lady. Mother Dumonlin, after due consideration and inspection of this prospective son-in-law, decided that, after all, she would sanction this marriage. And then there was more trouble!

Anais, learning of her mother's plans, decided she would "make good" the first statement, and so she proceeded to be "eleven years old" in her actions about the elder Durocher.

Well, there is some jolly good fun, until Anais gets tired of it all and decides she will go back to the convent, this time for good—but Edgar arrives in time and this snappy, laugh-provoking picture has a happy ending. It will please everyone.

NESTOR

A PIG'S A PIG (Feb. 24).—Edna is a terrible flirt. Her range is wide, for Daddy owns a ranch and the cowboys all dote on Edna. Daddy gets sick of coming upon lovelorn cowboys making love to Edna. He gets a brilliant idea. Edna shall suffer for her frivolity, if necessary, and he will have some fun at the same time.

Daddy says that the boy who shall catch a greased pig and bring it in first will get Edna. The boys agree, but Edna, with a very decided leaning toward Richard, thinks the idea is silly.

A clergyman is prevailed upon to be present in order to see the license properly signed and to perform the ceremony.

The boys start after a very active pig whose pace is increased by fear of the shouting throng after him.

Richard believes in brains rather than activity of foot and the ability to accumulate grease. He starts for the pig pen and secures a twin piggy. He greases him carefully and bears him in triumph to Edna and the astonished Daddy. He and Edna are quickly married and the congratulations are interrupted by a shouting throng of cowboys, one of whom bears a very angry and sticky pig.

Trouble is imminent, but the sense of humor prevails and congratulations take the place of chastisement.

VICTOR

THE APPEAL (Feb. 21).—Henry Warburton and his wife Isobel were a young married couple who supposedly, by their friends, "did live happy ever after." But this was not so. Isobel was a sort of a butterfly. She loved her husband and was true to him, but she liked to be admired by everyone and did not like to sit and wait for her husband to finish his work to take her out, so she went out with other fellows. At first Warburton was very willing that she did this, knowing her love for him and understanding that she just loved society and fun. After a while he grew tired of it and complained to his wife, and as a last resort ordered her NOT to do it again.

While at his office one day he needed a certain paper which was at his home. He hurriedly telephoned his wife to bring the paper to his office. She had something else to do first and did not think about hurrying with the paper. Thus a deal was lost through her lack of interest. When she left the office her husband watched her from the window and, to his amazement, saw her stand and talk with a gentleman on the street and then walk off with him. His jealousy was aroused and he followed. He saw the gentleman walk to his house and in the door. Had he but known that it was just a friend or that his wife put him out of the house when he told her he really cared for her, the troubles of Henry Warburton would have soon been at an end; but he suspected his wife instead, and this led to a disagreement and, at last, to a separation.

Too late Isobel saw her mistakes of the past—how she really neglected her husband thoughtlessly and what trouble it had brought upon them. She wrote for forgiveness, but was refused. At last, driven to desperation, she phoned to him—the last appeal to forgive. He was still hurt and unyielding, and so, with his ear to the phone, he heard the answer of her last appeal as it came to her. A shot and all was still, after a faint good-bye. Now, too late for Warburton, he saw his mistake, and was left to go on alone.

A NIGHT IN TOWN (Mar. 2).—Mr. Newmaryd and his wife leave for a trip to the country. Before so doing, Newmaryd invites his uncle to pay him a visit, never thinking that uncle would call while they were away. As soon as they are gone the maid and butler invite all their friends up to have a party. They dress in their employers' finery and are entertaining in fine style when uncle arrives. The butler introduces the maid as being the wife of his nephew, and uncle is very much smitten with her. He makes all sorts of advances to her and arouses the jealousy of her steady fellow, the butler. He sits in a corner with her, and the butler follows them. He chases the maid away, and then proceeds to give the old fellow a sound thrashing. Uncle runs away, and returns later when his nephew and wife have returned. His nephew introduces his wife, and uncle is considerably confused until Newmaryd explains that the woman uncle so much admired was a maid, and uncle dare not tell of the carrying on that was done in the absence of his nephew and his wife.

On the same reel:

THE INNOCENT BRIDEGROOM.—Belmont is courting Widow Keene. She sees him with a young lady and refuses to consider his suit until she has had him investigated. She employs a detective agency to find out all about him. She sees him on the street one day with the same young lady as before and decides to follow them. This she does, and discovers that the young lady is a hairdresser and masseur and that she is treating Belmont's scalp, he being rather short of hair. Satisfied that he is all right, the widow marries him and they go away on a honeymoon trip. However, she forgets to notify the agency to call off their sleuth. Belmont and his wife arrive at the country hotel and the detective follows them. He sees them register and notifies the clerk that the woman with Belmont is not his wife. They are ordered out of the hotel, and the detective goes up to their room for more evidence. Belmont and his wife return for their grips and discover the detective in their room. They think he is a burglar and a fight ensues. At last they go home and Mrs. Belmont is nearly consoled when a bill arrives from the detective agency for investigating her husband for $250. This Belmont has to pay, and all ends well after considerable explanations have been exchanged.

THE LAW OF COMPENSATION (Feb. 28).—Marx, chiefly owing to a love of ease, is a gentlemanly crook. He loves the excitement and the pitting of his wits against others.

One day he notes two well-dressed men going into a jeweler's—he steals up and watches them covertly and marks a handsome necklace of pearls bought by one of the men. He follows them up; they enter a saloon; he enters, too. His actions have awakened the suspicions of a detective, who has long wanted to catch Mark "with the goods." He watches and sees Marx go softly behind Mr. Jerome, one of the gentlemen, and take a jewelled cigarette case lying on the table. The detective rushes in and accuses Max. Mr. Jerome is a criminologist. He looks hard at Marx, then turns to the detective and tells him he is wrong. He gave the man the cigarette case. Marx thanks him eloquently with his eyes and goes. The detective is angry at thus being balked at his lawful prey, and expostulates with Mr. Jerome, who lays the detective a wager that the case will be returned to him. Marx is watched by three rascally companions. They demand that he hand over the cigarette case for sale and division of the spoils. Touched by the charity of Jerome, he refuses. There is a fight and Marx escapes. Before the struggle one of the men shows Marx a wallet he has stolen and sneeringly gives him a ticket to the charity ball.

Marx on reaching his room looks at the ticket and resolves to go. He dons his evening clothes and goes. Among the well-dressed throng he sees a beautiful woman wearing a valuable necklace of pearls. He appropriates it, well pleased with himself. He sees Jerome approach her and ask her to dance. He learns that the lady is Jerome's wife.

He comes face to face with Jerome and hands him back the cigarette case. He goes.

Mrs. Jerome discovers the loss and describes the man who apologized after accidentally cannoning against her. Jerome recognizes the description—it is Marx. He calls up the detective, who, with an officer, goes to Marx's room and arrests him. They take him to the Jerome home. The two men are face to face. Marx denies the theft, and coolly asks Jerome for a cigarette. Jerome is puzzled, but he opens his cigarette case and discovers the necklace lying therein.

The men look hard at each other. Jerome says: "I have need for a man like you." Marx can hardly believe his ears. A man wants him and will trust him. They shake hands on it.

THE SISTERS (Feb, 24).—Violet and Olive are sisters. They own a large farm. Violet is a good business woman while Olive is studious and shy. Both love Al, a young college boy.

Old Stubbs wants to marry Violet because their farms are next to each other. Edward, the foreman of the farm, loves Violet, but she considers him beneath her notice. Violet discovers that her love for Al, the college boy, is not returned, and her jealousy rises to an insane frenzy when she finds Al and her sister are engaged. In her rage she throws her sister to the floor and runs from the house. She sees a sign stating the gypsys are in camp and have love potions for sale. She bargains for one in the wild hope that she may win Al's love. Her jealousy rises until she buys poison from the gypsy.

This is secretly overseen by old Stubbs, Violet's venerable suitor, and he follows her.

She goes in her sleeping sister's room and puts the poison in her medicine. This is seen through the window by old Stubbs, who orders her to go back to the kitchen. She obeys, for she fears he will awaken the sister, but she reaches to take back the poison, but old Stubbs forbids her to touch it. He demands that she marry him or he will accuse her. She is about to consent, for her spirit is broken, when Edward, her foreman, who has been an unobserved witness of the poison episode, comes in the kitchen with the poison glass, which he throws in the fire and puts old Stubbs out.

Later, Violet marries the foreman; her sister the college boy.

IN THE SOUTH SEAS (Feb. 27).—Domingo is a pearl diver and a good husband to Afga. One day while diving with his basket, he brings up his last batch of shells, for he is stricken with an awful water blindness, the dread calamity which faces the pearl divers.

Afga, the wife, sorrows for her faithful partner. She insists upon taking her husband's place and dives. Fate decrees that Afga shall bring good fortune to lighten their pain. She discovers a large pearl, one of great price. She describes it to Domingo and they rejoice together. Several of the natives see the pearl.

The Chinese traders pay their periodical visit to the fishery and, after trading with the natives, learn of the big pearl. The crafty Ching Gow leaves Ah Foo to deal with the natives and goes to Domingo's hut. He uses all his wiles, but Domingo and Afga refuse to sell at Ching Gow's price.

Domingo and Afga fear for their pearl. They wrap it in a bulb of kelp and cover it with sand. Night comes and Ching Gow, Ah Foo and other Chinamen leave their ship and stealthily row to shore and enter Domingo's hut, and, after the couple have refused to divulge the hiding place of the pearl, they kidnap Domingo and Afga and take them aboard, where preparations are made to torture Domingo in the presence of his wife.

An instrument of torture is erected, put up over the hatch and consists of a huge stone set in a spiral coil so that when set going it will descend slowly but surely and crush the life out of the man beneath. Domingo is to be tied to a chair and placed under the stone. Afga watches the proceedings in horror from the top of the hatch.

Afga selects a moment when Ching Gow is below and a Chinaman is bending over the the infernal contrivance. She knifes the Chinaman, takes the knives he carries and throws his body into the sea. She descends the hatch, and, as Ah Foo and Ching Gow are gloating over their fiendish work, she manages to whisper to Domingo to avoid the chair. He understands. She gives him a knife, which he conceals. Afga returns to the deck and dives into the sea. Several of the Chinamen observe her and set out in a boat, which she dodges by her expert diving, and being helped by the darkness. Afga reaches shore and secures help. The natives swim out to the boat with Afga.

Ah Foo stands by the trigger ready to put the machine in action, while Ching is telling Domingo to sit in the chair. Domingo turns upon his enemy and there is a terrible struggle. Ah Foo sees this and drops upon Domingo. He is forcibly put in the chair and tied and securely bound.

Ah Foo returns to the trigger and releases it, when Afga and the natives swarm aboard and fight and kill the Chinese crew and Ah Foo. Ching Gow fights to the last, but is overpowered and placed beneath the rapidly descending stone. He is left to his fate, as Afga, guiding Domingo and the natives swim back to land.

The natives celebrate their victory with a characteristic dance and the pearl brings a good price, and, as Afga kisses Domingo's sightless eyes, he tells her he is well content in the possession of her wonderful love.

THE COWARD'S ATONEMENT (2-rell feature).—William Carter and Harry Collier are great friends and both love the bright, little Irene. She likes Will, but not enough to accept him. She becomes engaged to Harry. War breaks out between the North and South. Harry enlists joyfully, but Will only joins the Confederate army under compulsion. Colonel Dickinson does not believe in secession and joins the Union army. He is put in charge of a regiment to fight the Southerners. Irene weeps—as women must—when the boys march away.

Very early in the war Harry shows his mettle in saving an ammunition wagon on a burning bridge in the face of a galling Unionist fire. He is promoted to the rank of lieutenant. Will feels the pangs of jealousy, but overcomes them and congratulates his friend.

General Robert E. Less sends a dispatch, ordering a detachment to be sent under a picked man to defend the Georgia and Southern Railroad from the destroying Unionists, and Harry is assigned to the dangerous mission. In his company is Will. The Unionists, under Dickinson, blow up part of the road, but are utterly routed by the charge of the Confederates under the intrepid Harry. During the sharp fight Will sees two men fall, one on either side of him. He is wounded in the arm, and, in a panic of terror, he rides away. He goes to the home of Irene and gets into a window. She, not knowing who the marauder is, nearly shoots him for cowardice. He determines to retrieve himself as she bathes and binds his painful wound.

Colonel Dickinson arrives with his troops. Irene pushes Will into her bedroom. She permits the orderlies to search the house, but appeals to Colonel Dickinson when they go to her bedroom door. The colonel allows the room to go unsearched. Colonel Dickinson, in a room adjoining the one in which Will is concealed, writes a dispatch telling General Grant where to send reinforcements—to Stony Fork Bridge. Will hears the import of the message and determines to secure the dispatch. He writes a false dispatch, stating that the "Union reinforcements for Dickinson will arrive at Stony Fork Bridge to-morrow." This he puts into his breast pocket. Will gets out of the window and runs to the barn, where the horses are quartered, while Irene delays Colonel Dickinson by giving him some light refreshments.

The scout entrusted with the dispatch goes to the barn to get his horse. Will strikes him down with a whiffletree. Another guard hears the noise, runs to the barn door and is shot by Will, who has just time to hide the real dispatch in the bandages on his arm, when he is overpowered and taken before Colonel Dickinson. He is searched, and the false dispatch found in his breast pocket. Dickinson believes it to be his original dispatch, sends it off by another scout. He orders Will to be confined, but permits Irene to bathe and reban-dage his wounded arm. In this way Irene is able to obtain the original dispatch. She runs to the barn, and, seeing the dead scout, makes an old darkey strip the body of his clothes, and, donning these herself, she mounts and gets to the Confederate lines, where she is recognized by Harry.

Will, confined in the smokehouse at Irene's home, sees her go and feels more satisfied with himself, but determines to escape in order to thoroughly retrieve himself in the eyes of Irene, his cowardice and for his own salvation.

progresses, Breastworks are stormed and the battle sways back and forth. Dickinson orders his artillery to shell the town. A shell bursts through the smokehouse and Will escapes through the opening made thereby. The advance contingent of the Confederates is thrown back, and Harry, with reserves, comes to the rescue with one of his old-time charges. Will arrives breathless, unseen, and mad with the lust of battle. As he reaches the breastworks the Confederate flag bearer is shot. Will seizes the flag and, as he leaps over, he is shot and falls, mortally wounded, by the side of Colonel Dickinson, who is dying fast. The two opponents in the war shake hands and succor each other in the throes of death. Will sinks back "and for all the evil in his life he did, his death atoned."

Harry adds to his spurs, and he and Irene find their old comrade with his beloved flag wrapped around him and a smile of contentment on his lips.

GREAT NORTHERN

THE INDIAN SERVANT (Feb. 22).—This is an amusing comedy of a foreign diplomat who had returned to his home and brought with him an Indian who had attracted his attention during his travels. The Redman is introduced into the home of the diplomat as a servant and at once proceeds to play havoc with the routine of the household. His blunders are of the innocent sort for the time being, but he creates consternation among the regular white servants and makes friends only with the children of the family, and of these there are several. The good matron of the family, in an emergency, sends the Indian out to buy a bonnet for her own use, and when he returns he has three splendid articles of feminine headgear, which he later admits he had taken from the heads of young women whom he had met in the millinery shops. He returns to the house in triumph, but he is followed closely by the victims of the theft. The Indian tries to make love to the maids and gains the enmity of the mistress of the house by his attentions, which, although well meant, are entirely out of keeping with the customs of the people and community in which he finds himself. The climax arrives when on one eventful day the Indian is left to amuse the children during the absence of the family. All goes well for the time being, but the aborigine decides to give the youngsters the time of their lives. He starts by donning paint in all the colors of the rainbow and each of the kidlets are smiilarly adorned. They enjoy the war dances and have the furnishings of the house almost demolished when the parents arrive upon the scene. At the point of spears and other collections of relics found in the diplomat's rooms, the household help has been routed and it is with difficulty that the Indian is induced to settle down to routine, although the prospects of his remaining a "good Injun" are far from being certain.

On the same reel is a Great Northern scenic taken at Kullen, a cape on the west coast of Sweden.

VITAGRAPH

BEAU BRUMMEL, by James Young (Feb. 19).—In the early part of the nineteenth century, Beau Brummel was the most talked-of person in all the world, the extreme of fashion, the personification of elegance and the most pretentious individual imaginable.

Helen, the daughter of Lord Ballarat, falls a victim to his charms, although she is warned by the Duchess of Devonshire against him. Beau, not the least disconcerted, persists in his attentions to Helen and proposes to her. He is an intimate of the Prince of Wales and all the nobility of the period. They copy his style and ape his manners. Lord Devonshire and the Prince of Wales are very close friends, and when Beau Brummel insults the Prince, the lord forbids Helen seeing Beau until he apologizes to the Prince. Helen pleads with him to make amends to his highness, but he refuses, rather than disregard his own conceit or sacrifice his overbearing pride.

The Prince does not fail to resent Beau Brummel's effrontery and through him Beau's privileges and importance are very much lessened in swelldom. He indulges in all sorts of extravagances, irrespective of his means, and is soon reduced to social and financial ruin, and yet his pride is not at all disturbed, for he takes occasion again to snub the Prince, whom he chances to meet. In desperation, Brummel endeavors to recoup his fortune with his few remaining crowns, by staking his all at cards, and he loses.

He is now besieged by creditors and placed in a debtor's prison. Helen Ballarat, in sympathy, sends him, through her bankers, five hundred pounds, and he is released. With shattered mind, he retires into seclusion, and after years of destitution, he is rescued from poverty and the madhouse by his old friend Alvanley, who gives him a comfortable home, where he passes his time in dim memories of the past.

THE BETTER WAY (Feb. 19).—"The Better Way" is a strong, clean drama with a good moral.

In this play we find Mary, disgusted and discouraged at the life of unhappiness she is living with Jack Denver, her husband, who has been drinking heavily of late. At this opportune, or rather inopportune, moment, Tom Horton casually renews Mary's acquaintance. Horton had been Mary's girlish ideal previous to his departure to South America, and her marriage to Jack. Mary, in this frame of mind, is ready to listen to Horton's promises of happiness with him, and is willing to take this radical step.

Pauline, her little girl, seeing her mother packing up, and concluding they are going visiting, packs her little satchel and waits in the parlor until her mother appears preparatory to leaving with Horton. The sight of the child brings Mary to her senses and the elopment is abandoned. Jack learns the truth and makes an earnest, manly promise to reform.

GAUMONT

WHEN ALL WAS DARK (Feb. 18).—Barnard Powers is happy in his home life with his pretty wife. He is visited by several friends and there are many pleasant evenings passed at the card table and around the piano. Powers notices that his eyesight shows signs of weakening. One evening, when his wife, himself and friend, John Trapp, are together, his wife playing at the piano, sudden pains shoot through his eyes. All grows dim. The darkness passes, however, and he can again see. The next day the malady comes again in renewed force and Powers' vision entirely fails. He is entirely blind and experts declare it impossible to restore his lost vision.

A year passes. Powers is altogether in the dark, and in more than one way. Suddenly, without warning, his sight returns. He sees his wife sitting at the piano. By her side is the "friend," John Trapp. The "friend's" arms are wound affectionately around Mrs. Powers, who doesn't appear to be otherwise than pleased. It is an unpleasant sight to a man to whom everything has been in darkness for over a year. In pain he closes his eyes again. The love-making goes on before his eyes, so as to speak, as it had for many months.

Powers wants to know the extent of the damage to the honor of his home and name. A day later he is alone with his wife. She is sitting at the desk and is writing a letter. He believes it to be to Trapp. He employs a ruse to get her out of the room. He asks her to fetch a book for the blind that he had left in the parlor. He reads her letter: "Mine: It cannot be. What opinion would you have of the woman who would desert her blind husband. But should he recover his sight, I would come to you. Dora." Here is a terrible alternative. Were he to remain blind he would keep his wife although in soul she belonged to another. Were he to gain his sight he would lose her. He says nothing to her during the day.

In the evening, despite the import of the letter, Trapp calls, unconscious that the supposedly blind husband is watching his every move. Trapp begs in sign language that Mrs. Powers elope with him. He pulls from his pocket the letter and shows it to Mrs. Powers and gesticulates his pleadings that she go to him.

Then from the chair rises the outraged husband, no longer in his eyes the dull, vacant stare of eyes that cannot see. There is in them the light of intelligence, the light of a consciousness terrible. The husband says not a word, but merely looks, looks from his supposedly sightless eyes into the eyes of Trapp. Powers' arm goes up, his finger pointing to the door. There is no violence of language. Trapp picks up his hat and walks out into the night. Mrs. Powers falls at her husband's feet. Great sobs come from her throat. "I have seen all," are the words of the husband, as he lays his hand upon the erring head.

LOVE THY NEIGHBOR (Feb. 20).—Mary Brown's nifty nieces come a visiting. "Go to the aunt, thou sluggard," is a lovely adage, just like mother used to make. Next door lives Mr. A. Cart Wheel. His nephews, the Wheel brothers, do a turn at home during the holidays. It happens that the Wheel dog is a chicken chaser. Foul play is his specialty. He fancies that he can make scrambled eggs by pursuing the hens. He is the original reason why the chicken crossed the street. He lays for the chickens more than they lay for their board. The Wheel dog crosses the hedge leading into Mary Brown's hennery and he chases the hens more than the most ardent rooster that ever cock-a-doodle-dooed. This puts him and his owner into bad repute with Mary Brown.

Accordingly when Mary Brown's nifty nieces learn of the presence of the Wheel brothers, there is strong objection by the old folks of their becoming acquainted. They find that flirting is a good exercise for the heart, although it has caused many cases of cross-eye. Inasmuch as the boys and girls are forbidden to have each other's company, there needs must be strategy. They determine that boys will be girls and girls will be boys; that one can change his sex while he waits and that clothes make the man and also the woman. One of the girls changes clothing with one of the boys and each masquerader clambers over the hedge and tries to act natural. When Mary Brown and the elder Mr. Wheel come along they find their supposed nieces and nephews respectively, busily engaged in their duties.

One of Mary Brown's hens, as though to avenge itself on the dog or his owner, crosses the hedge and gets into Mr. Wheel's garden whereupon it is mentioned that the hen is worse than the old scratch, that hen parties are destructive and that judging by the activity of her Henship, the ground must have itched terribly.

The elder Wheel, a la Johnny get your gun, chases the scratching hen into her own domain and then, through the hedge, takes hasty aim. It happens that one of his disguised nephews is there with his sweetheart. There are many perforations of the nephew thereof, as the elder Wheel's aim is about as good as that of the Spanish gunners in the war of '98. "It is bad enough to talk behind a man's back, but it is worse to shoot him behind his back or rather below his back," says the half-shot nephew. He then queries as to whether his sweetheart has ever been shot between the garden and the pantry.

He talks it over with the girl and they decide that they will use the uncle's bad marksmanship as the means of entering connubial bliss. He remarks lovingly to his brother that he has been shot into matrimony and that if the uncle had fired the other barrel, he would have become a bigamist. "I suppose people will say that I was fired at my wife," he concludes. The conspirators get together and write the following letter to the elder Wheel: "You hit the wrong chicken. She now has to eat her dinner off the mantlepiece. Every time she sits down she thinks of it. But it certainly made her smart. But to be brutally blunt, I believe it your duty to arrange a marriage between her and the nephew who most pleases her. If you don't agree, I'll charge you for the time I spent in picking lead out of her. She was a human lead mine."

The elder Wheel sees visions of spending the rest of his declining years in a cell dining on bread and water and he believes that he would rather have his nephews married than to suffer the fate of a chicken stealer. He takes his nephews to Mary Brown's house. The girl and the youth in the meantime have exchanged clothing. There is much match-making. It is finally agreed to save expenses. To get a cheap rate at the minister's they decide upon having a double wedding in which both nieces and both nephews will play heavy parts.

THE VIOLIN.—A touching story of an old musician's love for his violin. It is a masterpiece of Kinemacolor, full of pathos and excellent acting. To save the life of his granddaughter the old violinist pawns his beloved instrument. When the girl recovers, both bend every effort to the redeeming of the violin. The girl goes out to service, the old man copies music, almost starving in his effort to save the pennies he earns. To the rich home comes a famous violinist. The account of his playing is read in a newspaper by the pawnbroker, and the old man's violin is sold to the rich musician. When the poor people have saved the ten dollars necessary to redeem the violin, they hasten to the pawnshop only to find that the interest not having been paid the violin has been sold.

The rich and celebrated violinist is the guest of the people for whom the girl works. There she sees her grandfather's violin. She cannot resist the temptation to play upon it. The professor hears and hastens into the music room. When he learns her story, he takes the girl and violin back to the old man, who hugs his lost treasure to his breast and, oblivious to all his surroundings, pours out his soul upon the violin.

The picture has a force and a grip from its faithful human touch, the contrast of youth and age, poverty and riches.

MYSTIC MANIPULATION.—A novel Kinemacolor subject illustrating some clever sleight-of-hand feats. First some examples of palming are given, and then the conjurer cuts an orange in half and closes it with the pulp undisturbed. Opening the orange again, he shows that all the pulp has gone, a duster having taken its place. A number of tricks with colored balls follow and a very effective section shows milk poured into a bowl from one glass and then claret added from another. Then comes the surprise, the claret suddenly leaves the milk with which it had been mingled and the milk follows, each liquid going back into the glass in which it was at first. This particular trick, of yourself, would be nothing without the aid of Kinemacolor, as the sudden loss of the red ingredient of the mixture of milk and claret would not be visible.

GETTING EVEN (Feb. 19).—Detective Slender is hopelessly seeking a clue to the Alice Cole murder mystery when his daughter Maud shows him a photograph which she took of a young man in the park that morning. Slender has a sudden inspiration; the photograph accords with the description of the alleged murderer. He therefore has it published as such with a well-written story, in the Evening News.

The next morning the young man is greatly surprised to behold his picture in the paper represented as that of the murderer, and, remembering the incident in the park, resolves to take revenge. While the young lady was taking a snap-shot of him, his camera wasn't idle. He now sends her photograph to the newspaper with the story that Alice Cole could not have been murdered or he could not have obtained her picture in the park the day before.

The genial detective is greatly dismayed to see his daughter's picture under the name of the famous Alice Cole in the newspaper, and, accompanied by Maud, immediately rushes over to the office to complain. There they meet the young man, however, and explanations are followed by a hearty laugh over the whole affair and the beginning of a friendship between the young people.

HIS REDEMPTION (Feb. 22).—Anne and Joseph are engaged to be married and are as devoted as any pair of lovers can be until, one day, a friend informs Joseph that Arthur, the brother of his intended bride, is a bandit. Greatly shocked, Joseph relates what he has heard to his fiancee, and insists upon breaking off the engagement. Anne closely watches her brother's actions and, one day, secretly overbears him with one of his accomplices planning a robbery. At the appointed time, the two bandits conceal themselves near the highway, and, when a carriage rounds the corner, quickly spring out to halt it. But, to their astonishment, who should step out but Anne, who, tearing the disguise from her brother's face, rebukes him severely. Unable to endure the condemnation, Arthur seeks refuge in the hills where later, in solitude and remorse, he is discovered by Joseph, to whom he makes a full confession of his crimes, and promises to lead an honest life in the future. Joseph forgives, and arm in arm they return home, where a complete reconciliation takes place, and love lives again.

THANHOUSER

THE PRETTY GIRL IN LOWER FIVE (Feb. 18).—It is a long trip from Chicago to Los Angeles, and when the young man boarded the train in the Windy City, he was afraid that time would hang heavily on his hands. Then he looked around the car and saw one interesting object, a pretty girl in Lower 5. He had Section 6, directly across the aisle, and he did all he could, in a gentlemanly way, to scrape up an acquaintance. The maiden, however, viewed him with disdain, and would not even accept his assistance when she was unable to open the window. They stood together on the platform of the observation car, but they might as well have been miles apart, for she ignored his presence. There was sorrow in Section 6, and freezing disdain in Section 5, while the train was plunging its way westward.

The scenery changes on an overland trip, and so do the dispositions of many passengers. The young man in 6 found a chance to be the gallant knight of the damsel in 5, acquaintance followed, and long before they arrived at the California city they were on friendly terms. In Los Angeles the girl was met by her father, the boy by his sister, and the friendship so unconventionally begun later ripened into a happy love romance.

THE TWO SISTERS (Feb. 21).—One sister was useful; she was a hard-working doctor in a little country town. The other sister was ornamental; she was young, pretty, stylish and thoroughly selfish.

The doctor worked hard to keep her sister in luxury. When their parents died, they had left the little girl as a sacred legacy to their elder child, and she never forgot it.

The doctor had a sweetheart, a young lawyer, who was far from being the manly chap she thought him. He met the little sister when she returned on a summer vacation from her fashionable boarding school, and promptly forgot the vows of love he had made the elder girl. The doctor awoke one morning to find that her sister and her sweetheart had eloped, leaving only an indifferent message behind them. It took from her life all she had to love and from that time on she tried by hard work to forget her sorrows.

Five years later, the school girl was a haggard, worn woman, city gayety had wrecked her constitution, and her husband, who had wedded her only for her beauty, began to regret his bargain when he saw he had an invalid on his hands. He cruelly deserted her, as cruelly as he and the woman had gone away five years before. Fortunately for the neglected wife, she had still one friend, the sister she had wronged. The doctor worried about the girl, and something, perhaps it was intuition, led her to search for her sister just when the younger woman needed her most. She found her broken in health and spirits, but the doctor, through her medical skill, was able to restore her physically, although it was a long time before her mental calm came back to her, and she never forgot that everything she was or had she owed to the big sister who had repaid deceit with love.

ESSANAY

THE THREE QUEENS (Feb. 14).—Wilbur Blackburn, a man about town, and a social favorite, spends most of his time at the club with his fellow colleagues. His wife, a shadow of the woman she used to be, is waiting in the early hours of the morning for her husband's return. Previously, their married life had been one of bliss. Two charming children had blessed the fond parents during their happy married life. On this particular night in mention, the little girl, Dorothy, four years old, was very, very sick. The mother, still seated by the window, waiting for her husband, notices the baby, a girl of two, creep into the room. She takes the baby up in her arms and holds her fondly to her breast, and tells her that papa will come home soon. The mother carries her back to bed. The father arrives, looks into the room, decides not to disturb his wife, throws himself on the couch and goes to sleep. He dreams that Dorothy is very sick. He goes to the club and gambles, loses a lot of money, and leaves. He then imagines that the baby had died. Rushing into the bedroom, he finds that his wife had committed suicide, by shooting herself in the head. He is prostrated. His wife, having put the youngest daughter to bed, enters the living room and finds her husband asleep on the couch. She awakens him. He is so overjoyed at seeing his wife and, realizing it was all a dream, clasps her in his arms and promises her that he will never go to the club again. He seats himself at a table in his living room and tries awfully hard to play a game of solitaire. The boys at the club call him up and ask him to come and play a game. The temptation is too strong; he cannot resist. He goes to the club, sits down and starts to play a game. The cards are dealt and he holds three queens in his hand. These cards dissolve and, he sees the faces of his two loving children and his darling wife in his hand. This is too much for him. He rushes from the club, goes to a nearby florist, where he purchases an enormous bouquet of chrysanthemums and, takes them to his wife, who is awaiting his arrival with open arms...

PILOT

THE TWO GLASSES (Feb. 20).—The Two Glasses, from a poem by Ella Wheeler Wilcox, is a symbolical play, showing the influences of wine and water. After a dinner the two glasses get confidential, and tell each other stories of their past. The wine glass proudly tells its humble companion how it has dethroned kings, brought men down from lofty positions, thrown people into prison who have been highly respected, dragged down virtue, and debased humanity in general. The humble water glass cannot boast of such victories, but quietly tells its companion how it has succored the wounded on battlefields, helped the parched wanderers on the desert, rehabilitated the drunkard, and uplifted many who have fallen. Overcome with remorse, acknowledging the superiority of its humble companion, the wine glass totters and falls.

EDISON

HIS ENEMY, Bannister Merwin (Feb. 18).—This is a character story with a moral. It deals with a bumptious, conceited, know-it-all young fellow who has yet to learn his lesson.

George Trent is the son of a widowed mother. He is engaged to marry Sylvia Bennett, and is a cocksure egoist. An old clergyman, his mother's friend, gets him a chance with a prosperous arcbitect in a large city, but his faults get him into a nest of trouble. He is careless with his work, unwilling to take advice and consequently his downfall is brought about, not dramatically, but in a natural way. It is not that he is vicious, but simply that he pays the penalty for the faults of his character. At the same time Sylvia gives him the mitten because he has displayed before her a bad trait.

He has seen part of a letter from his employer to the Rev. Mr. Roberts, in which the assertion is made that "he has a bad enemy." He goes to the clergyman and demands to know who his enemy is, for he has concluded that his downfall is due to this mysterious person, and in answer the clergyman leads him to a mirror. To his surprise and consternation he learns that bis enemy is no other than himself.

Tbe result of realization is regeneration. His entire attitude cbanges and he is given another chance with his old employer. At the end of the picture we see that be has learned his lesson well.

RELIANCE

THE BELLS (Feb. 19).—Mathias, an innkeeper, receives notice that bis rent is due seven months and that if it is not paid at once, his inn will be taken from him. In the midst of a terrible snowstorm, a Jew arrives in his sleigh at the inn. While paying his bill he discloses to Mathias's eyes a bag of gold. This sets him to thinking how much he needs that money. Tbe Jew gets up at night and has his sleigh taken from the barn. He must be off to town, and starts off, all the bells of his sleigh ringing. This awakens Mathias. He slowly gets out of bed and follows the Jew through the snow. Creeping up behind the sleigh he murders the Jew and carries his body to tbe limekiln. He feels very safe for no one has seen him leave the house. But through the fifteen years that follow he never sees a golden coin witbout hearing the sleighbells as they rang on the night of December 24th, when he murdered the Jew in his sleigh. Matbias bas a daughter, Annette, who becomes engaged to Christian, a young soldier. Matbias leaves his inn to purchase Christmas presents in a neighboring town. While there he attends a sbow given in tbe town hall by a noted hypnotist, La Voir. Tbis man makes an announcement that by hypnotism he can make any subject tell the thing that weighs upon his conscience. Feigning illness, Mathias at once leaves the hall. But after he returns to his inn, La Voir visits his town and puts up at Matbias's place. He proves to be a friend of Christian, who makes him acquainted with tbe family. Unable to stand the man's searching gaze, Mathias goes to his room and falls asleep. He dreams tbat he is on trial for murdering the Jew. When he denies all knowledge of the crime, the judge calls in La Voir, who by the power of his art, makes Mathias tell what he did on the night of December 24, 1818. Under La Voir's influence Mathias tells tbe entire story and goes over the ground of the murder step by step. He tells of the falling snow, his many visions of the dead Jew, and the unending ringing of the bells. He then dreams be is condemned to be hanged, and when he feels the rope about his neck, choking him, he wakens to stagger out into the hall. But the terrible dream bas been too much for the already conscience-burdened man, and, clutching at his throat, be falls dead before his daughter and her fiance, wbo bave come to call him.

EVELYN'S STRATEGY (Feb. 22).—The King of Wall Street having conquered all his financial opponents, lays siege to Evelyn's heart. But she does not care for bim—having bestowed her heart upon Jack Fleming. Morton, learning of this, determines to ruin Jack financially—hoping therehy to win the girl. Flattered hy the attention of so powerful a man, Jack invests and loses his income. He is on the verge of despair when Evelyn tells him they will outwit the king yet. She obtains credit for Jack at his brokers and goes short on tbe market. Then sbe writes to Morton asking him to come to see her. He comes and by a wisely manipulated piece of work, she imprisons him in the cellar. Then she goes to the police and tells them Morton has been killed while walking with her. They hurry to the scene and find the revolver she had planted. She further explains that the man who committed the murder flung his body into the river. The market slumps at the news of the king's death and Evelyn wins by the reversal. Morton is released to learn he has been outwitted by a girl.

PUNCH

ROWDY STARTS SOMETHING (Feb. 20).—The domestic peace of the Hallowells, a young couple living in a small town, is disturbed by a poorly cooked breakfast, and Dick, the husband, leaves the bouse angrily after bis wife has threatened to return to her mother. She starts packing her trunks and he proceeds to the quarries, of which he is the manager. Rowdy, the family bulldog, follows his master. Reaching tbe quarry, Hallowell is told by his foreman that the supply of dynamite is low, and, investigating, is followed into the hut where the explosives are kept, by the dog, who seizes a stick of the higbly, dangerous dynamite in his moutb and startles Dick and the foreman by appearing before them with it. Fearing every moment that the dog will cause it to explode by biting or dropping it, the two men scatter in terror. At bis wits end Dick hurries home followed by the dog, who scatters fear on every side. Rowdy, unable to understand the excitement be is causing, reaches tbe house only to find it locked and the family barricaded inside. He gains entrance, however, througb an open window, and rushes into the sitting room with tbe dynamite still in his mouth. The Hallowells' child calls the dog, and but for the sudden entrance of the nurse might have seized the stick. But, upon seeing the dog and hearing the shouts of the Hallowells, the nurse flees from the bouse pursued by Rowdy. Dick calls upon the police, who hurry to the house. Tired of pursuing the nurse, the dog has returned to bis kennel, and when the police and Dick find him, is sitting comfortably before it witb tbe stick before bim. They surround tbe kennel, but he routs them and drives tbem over the back fence, grabbing up the stick and following his master, who now flies wildly down the street. Dick attempts to board a street car, bu Rowdy follows and empties it of all its passengers, even the motorman deserting his post. Into the country Dick flies with the dog behind him, stumbling over a camp of tramps and almost ruffling the happiness of a pair of young lovers. In attempting to cross a stone wall the dynamite explodes, and all danger now ever, Dick hurries to tbe nearest telephone and informs his agonized wife that he is safe. As he turns from the 'phone, Rowdy, covered witb dust, etc., comes in. Like a cat, he seems to have nine lives, and as Dick sinks thunderstruck and weak upon a box, the dog covers his face with kisses.

On tbe same reel:

BY PARCEL POST.—Little Mr. Gray and his still smaller wife, are surprised to receive a letter from their sister saying she is sending her dear little girl to spend a month with them. They prepare a room with dainty doll-like furniture, but when little Mary arrives, it is found sbe will not even fit in the door. She is so tall and so broad, tbat she can take both uncle and aunt up in one arm. And the poor postman, who brought tbis precious package by parcel post, tbinks it the worst ever, even worse than cbickens, monkeys, dancing bears and other impediments he has been loaded down with. As a travesty on the newly instituted parcel post, this picture is a scream right through.

MAJESTIC

THE HIRED DRESS SUIT (Feb. 16).—Florence, young and pretty, admires the way Dick dresses, but looks rather in disdain upon Bob, who is inclined to shabbiness.

Spurred on by this, Bob buys a hargain suit for $12.50. But on the first day be wears it, a scrubwoman drops a pail of water over him. And then the suit begins to sbrink. Florence, who is with him, notices the suit and calls his attention to it. He takes one look and bolts. Dick sails up and escorts Florence. Bob buys another suit at a store which claims tbeir suits never shrink. This time he gets a frock coat. But when he arrives at Florence's he finds Dick already there clad in immaculate evening dress. This gets Bob's goat. He takes out bis bank hook and unwillingly draws out his last cent and is fitted for evening clothes. Florence is delighted with his appearance, but, when he proposes, she is dubious about marrying a man who dresses so extravagantly and says they may consider themselves engaged when he has $200 in the bank. On his way home Bob gets into a quarrel with a man whom he takes for a burglar. He proves to be one of tbe neighbors. During the battle. Bob's new evening dress is torn to shreds. Walking along gloomily Bob falls into an excavation. He is next seen in a hospital cot. A man, representing the Millionaire's Realty Company, comes to settle Bob's claim, much to Bob's surprise, for he didn't know he bad a bad case. The agent takes out a hundred dollar bill, Bob sits by dumbly, untable to speak. The man takes out another. Bob faints. The agent gets scared and lays four one hundred dollar bills on the table. Bob comes to and grabs them. Florence comes to see him, and wben her father sees the money, he willingly gives his consent to the marriage, and Florence is perfectly satisfied.

GIRL, ARTIST AND DOG (Feb. 18).—Donald Willis, a promising young artist, thougb but a boy in years, goes with his mother to a beautiful new home in the heart of the country. He is delighted to live so close to nature, and every morning starts off to indulge bis passion for painting the beauties of the woods and fields.

One day he meets a girl—a ragged, barefoot girl—but with a face of rare loveliness. He asks her to pose for him. She shyly runs up to the tumbled down shanty in whicb she lives, for her mother's permission. Her mother, a coarse, uncouth woman, refuses harshly and sends the boy away.

But he cannot forget the tattered girl with the lovely wistful face, and soon visits her again in the foods. They become the best of friends, this boy and girl. He meets her each day by an old stone wall—and one day he whispers his love to her. And she tells him she has loved bim since the first day he came to her. He wants to marry her at once—before his stately, aristocratic mother can interfere. But as be looks at her ragged dress and bare feet, he knows this would be impractical. He buys her a dainty frock in the village—and a bonnet and some slippers. In a twinkling she is transformed, and tbey are married in the little rectory.

But his mother sees through the fine clothes—and knows the girl for what she is. Heartbroken at what she supposes will ruin her boy's life, she treats the girl with coldness and disdain that almost breaks the loving, trusting heart.

Three years pass. There is a baby in the home now. Tbe mother of the boy loves the child, but has not yet learned to even tolerate its mother. The boy sees this constant friction and grieves over it. Finally the girl, unable to stand it any longer, takes ber baby and goes back to her mother's shanty. But she is not wanted tbere eitber. She finds her way to tbe old stone wall—trysting place of long ago—and here she weeps out her misery. The boy finds her a little later and understands. He takes both wife and child bome.

"You cannot have the baby unless you are prepared to receive her mother with equal love and kindness," be says. And the grandmother, holding out her arms to the child, claps the girl also in close embrace.

LUX

THE LEOPARD AND THE BURGLARS (Feb. 21).—Seeing that sevral desperadoes are causing the police much trouble, a detective purchases a leopard and gets on the trail. With amazing alacrity the burglars hasten from out the scene, with the leopard hard upon their trail.

On the same trail:

WHEN UNCLE MADE HIS WILL.—Upon learning that their uncle is about to make his will, the Spoofems hasten to pay their respects to him in the bope that they will not be forgotten. The journey is a long one, and their haste leads them to adopt every possible form of locomotion that is possible to find. They arrive in the most rural of country, and there are reduced to the uttermost limit of despair by the lack of good locomotive power. Their experience in donkey barrows, or in riding steeplechases upon cows' backs, provide an amusing film.

CHICAGO NOTES

Mr. A. Balaban, manager of the popular showhouse at 3241-43 West Twelfth street, is surely a loyal member of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of America, besides being a most gentlemanly fellow. At a little impromptu spread at the Hotel La Salle, where were present National President M. A. Neff, National Secretary Christenson, National Vice-President Sweeney, of Chicago, and a few others, when President Neff suggested that, in the event of a decision against the Patents Company in the United States courts, all the money paid by exhibitors to that company in royalties would be returned to the exhibitors, Mr. Balaban said:

"Just put this down for me, that if that becomes a truth, and the money is refunded, I will turn all such money so returned over to the treasurer of the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League, and I hope every other exhibitor in America will do likewise, for the day is not far distant when, as an association of business men, we will need the money!"

Bravo, Brother Balaban! Noble words, nobly spoken, and, very possibly, most prophetic. I would most respectfully suggest, however, that Mr. Balaban's heroic and generous expression be heralded throughout the land, that all of the other loyal members of the league may be induced to join with him in putting the organization on a footing where, if anything serious should ever confront it, the "fighting ammunition" would be within easy reach. Here's a Happy New Year to all such as are big enough and brave enough to emulate Mr. Balaban in this move.

* * * *

Out in Maywood, at Fifth avenue and Madison street, on New Year's eve, the beautiful new concrete and steel edifice known as the Yale Theatre, 500-seat capacity, owned by Messrs. Miller & Ledwell, opened its inviting doors to an admiring public, and has been doing a splendid business since. This is one of our classiest 10-cent theatres, and the management promises nothing but the best for its patrons, having secured for the season one of Chicago's most popular soloists, Dorothy Ledwell, in illustrated songs, and Mr. Al Asmall in famous spotlight hits of Remick's latest productions, with the pleasing addition of three reels of latest picture plays.

* * * *

If a jovial disposition, together with a happy smile and hearty handshake is a criterion, then Mr. Arthur Wilkas, manager of the University Theatre, at 1913 Van Buren street, is getting his share of business. His hearty, "Come over and see me" will be taken advantage of.

The Virginia features a foreign film in connection with its regular reels. Manager Noonan also offers good music at this house of mirrors.

FOREIGN CONSULAR REPORTS

Honduras

(From Vice Consul Kenneth Stuart Patton, Ceiba)

There are no moving picture shows in Ceiba now (March, 1912). There was such a show here several months ago, but the enterprise failed on account of the inability to secure film exchanges and suitable quarters and because of the quality of the machines operated.

It might be feasible to bring a traveling motion picture show to Ceiba, provided a change of program could be effected at every performance, or at least very frequently, and a suitable hall secured. At the present time there is such a hall, and a Spanish vaudeville company is showing there. It will probably remain only a short while. The best season of the year to start such a venture would be from March until August, these months being the time in which the fruit trade is at its liveliest and when the natives have more money to spend. Truxillo and Puerto Cortes are the only other towns on this coast that would be capable of supporting such an enterprise.

Cost of Transportation a Factor

One could ascertain the cost of bringing the necessary paraphernalia here by consulting either the United Fruit Co., or Vaccaro Bros. & Co., both of New Orleans. These companies run the only steamers between Ceiba and the United States. If the initial expense is heavy, it would not be advisable to undertake the risk. Vaccaro has a small electric plant here for his offices and shops and might be willing to supply electric power if such be feasible.

Admission might be placed at 10 and 20 cents. It would probably be impracticable to give more than four or five performances a week, and these should be at night, inasmuch as the population is a busy one.

In case any American firm try the venture, it would be well to bring along films and take pictures of trips up the beautiful tropical streams that run from the mountains to the coast through wonderful forests.

Malta

(From Consul James Oliver Laing, Valetta)

Two methods of introducing the advertising into motion pictures have been employed. One is to show signboards advertising merchandise in the scenery or setting of a moving picture drama. The other is to introduce the names of commercial exhibitors into films representing a country fair such as the well-known yearly fairs of England or a market scene such as the markets of Nizhni Novgorod. The display of the firm's name is followed by a series of pictures representing its exhibit at the fair or the working of its plant. Some criticisms have been made of the first method, the signs displayed (on account of incongruities of time, place, or situation) being sometimes ill adapted for association with the scenes in which they are placed.

India

(From Consul Edwin S. Cunningham, Bombay.)

The principal cities in this consular district are Bombay, with a population of almost 1,000,000; Ahmedabad, 186,000; Poona, 153,000; and Baroda, 1,000,000. There are five moving picture shows in Bombay, four of which use Pathé machines and one a Gaumont. The majority of the films are of French manufacture, Pathé, as a rule, but other films are: Itala Co, Italy; Barker Motion Photography Co., London; Gaumont & Co.; Urban Manufacturing Co.; Cines Co., of Rome; Edison Co.; and Vitagraph Co. So far as I am advised, the American films are used by only one of the local theatres. There are no manufacturers of either moving picture or cinematograph machinery in this district.

Australia

(From Consular Agent U. W. Burke, Fremantle, West Australia)

The principal cities and towns of West Australia are Perth, the capital, with a population of 55,000; Kalgoorlie and Boulder, 29,000; Fremantle, 20,000; Midland Junction and Guildford, 6,000; Geraldton, 4,000; Bunbury, 4,000; and Albany, 3,000. Moving picture shows are in operation in each of these places, the machines used being Pathé and Gaumont, and the films American, English and French. Moving picture machines are not manufactured in this state.

Samoa

(From Consul Mason Mitchell, Apia.)

Apia has a population of about 600 whites and half-castes, and the island, Upolu, has 22,000 natives. Moving picture shows come from Australia several times a year, remaining a month, and then going to the Fiji or Tonga Groups. A local company was recently organized in Apia, which gives three shows a week. It uses a French machine and obtains its films from Sydney, Australia. The films are of American and European manufacture.

Valencia a Furniture-Manufacturing Center

(From Consul Robert Frazer, Jr., Valencia, Spain)

Present prospects for the Spanish importation of opera chairs and general seating supplies for theatres and other places of amusement are not encouraging so far as the Valencia district is concerned.

With the sole exception of trial samples of office furniture and barbers' chairs, no furniture of any kind has been imported here during the past eight years. Valencia is one of the most important centres of Spain for the manufacture of chairs and miscellaneous furniture; and although the greater part of the lumber used by furniture factories is imported, the employment of modern machinery and abundance of labor at a low wage scale contribute to cheapen the cost of production, while the very high tariff on imported furniture effectively excludes foreign competition.

Plain wooden chairs without moldings or ornamentation pay a duty of $13.51 per 100 kilos (220.46 pounds), which is equivalent to an ad valorem duty of about 40 per cent, as the value on which the tariff schedule was based was $33.80 per 100 kilos. Chairs the wood of which is turned or with moldings attached pay $28.95 per 100 kilos, and chairs upholstered with leather, silk, or silk mixtures pay duty at the rate of $33.80 per 100 kilos, the estimated cost of production on which this last-named tariff was framed being $96.50 per 100 kilos.

American Styles Copied

The few sample chairs and pieces of office furniture imported from America serve only as models for imitation, and an important factory recently established at Barcelona is turning out exclusively American designs, which are reproduced with marked fidelity in form and appearance.

The chairs most in demand here are of plain wood, seated with stamped veneers, or rushes and sedges grown on the borders of the marshes and rice fields near this city, and cost only 50 cents per chair complete. These chairs are piled in thousands during the long summer in the public parks, open-air theatres, churches, etc., and are hired at the rate of 1 to 5 cents per hour or performance, according to the importance of the festivity or celebration.

There are no importing merchants or jobbers in foreign furniture in Valencia, and all firms engaged in the furniture trade appear to take it for granted that there is no possibility of competing with home products at present.

Japan Supplies its Own Needs

(From Consul-General Thomas Sammons, Yokohama, Japan)

The ruling factor in the sale of chairs for amusemnt halls in Japan is cheapness; and although quality and durability are desirable features, the cost of the home-made article is so low and so adapted to the present needs of the people that little encouragement can be held out as yet for the sale of Western equipment. Of the four classes into which the seats of amusement halls in Japan are divided, only two, the "special" first and the first class are provided with chairs, the greater majority of seats included in the third and second classes being merely rude wooden benches.

Lists of moving picture theatres or other pertinent names that accompanied the foregoing and other consular reports may be had upon application to the Bureau of Manufactures. Among earlier articles on the foreign cinematograph trade that have been published in Daily Consular and Trade Reports were those appearing in the issues for August 5 and October 12, 1910; January 14, April 28, May 29, August 22, and October 7 and 14, 1911; and January 13, 1912.

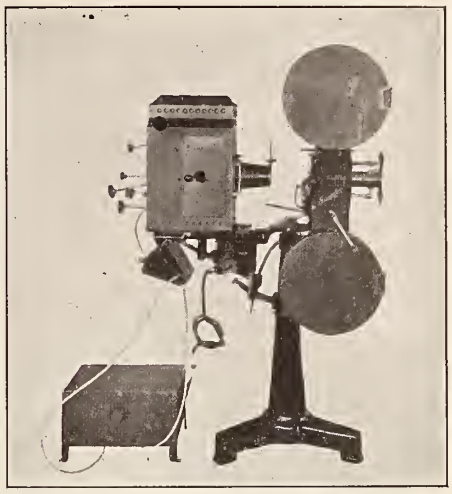
Nothing Left Undone to Make Things Handy for the Operator



A knurled knob conveniently placed on the outside of the mechanism case enables you to keep your picture in perfect focus.

Another adjusting knob makes it possible to reset the shutter and eliminate the travel ghost without stopping the machine.

You can instantly and accurately set the intermittent movement. There is only one eccentric bushing in the and it is so much easier to set than the two eccentric bushings in most other machines that it's a joke.

Did you ever turn the crank on a Simplex? It runs so easy and quiet you will think the mechanism has been taken out until you open the case and see the wonderful workmanship on the parts. Then you will understand.

Space prevents our mentioning many other original and convenient features of the mechanism, lamp, lamphouse, condenser mount, pedestal, etc.

OPERATORS, GET WISE. The Simplex machine means more to you than you now realize. Send for catalogue B and instructions.

GAUMONT RECEIVES UNUSUAL PROPOSITION FROM DETECTIVE AGENCY

The editor of the Gaumont Weekly recently was approached by a celebrated detective agency with a rather unusual proposition, which he was compelled to turn down. The detective agency is employed in protecting banks against burglaries, forgeries and other depredations by the criminally disposed. The detective chief believed that if he could obtain the insertion each week in the Gaumont Weekly of a photograph of a criminal ardently "wanted" for crimes against banks, he would so make it impossible for the said crook to live in the United States, and the country quickly would be rid of many undesirables.

The detective was indeed paying the Gaumont Weekly a compliment when he contended that it was possible for this film to make bank robbery practically a lost art. At the same time he failed to remember that the Gaumont Weekly is shown in hundreds of churches and schools throughout North America, where the subject would in many cases not be understood. The Gaumont Weekly takes the stand that crime is largely a matter of congestion and by holding up to the gaze of millions of people a picture of a famous crook, there is a possibility that men and boys ordinarily with but slight criminal inclinations would strongly be reminded of the possibilities of crime. Thus, such a "rogues' gallery" in the Gaumont Weekly might accomplish more harm than good. The Gaumont Weekly will not attempt to compete with the dictagraph in point of healing social cankers.

MR. CLAUDE PATIN, OF GAUMONT CO.

Claude Patin, lately arrived from the Paris office of the Gaumont Company to assume charge of the Paris matters in the Flushing office of the Gaumont Company, will be an assistant to Herbert Blache. Mr. Patin's lieutenancy will leave Mr. Blache more free for his major duties of policy, politics and general management.

Another writes "Our exhibitors are already booking your films in advance"; all of which goes to prove that a good film is very quickly recognized and appreciated.

We call special attention to our release of FEBRUARY 27TH, "THE DOLL AND THE DEVIL", written by the well known ROY L. McCARDELL. We are sure you are going to like this highly costumed spectacular comedy, and also the artistic one and three-sheet posters.

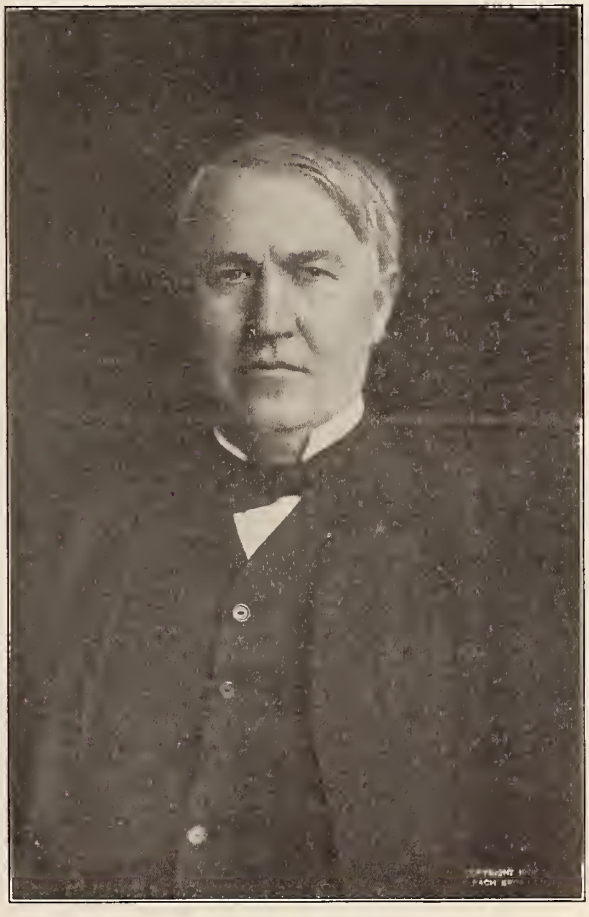
THOMAS A. EDISON

A Tribute to the Kinetophone

IT has been my privilege in time past to take up cudgels on behalf of the industry against Thomas A. Edison, but this time I have to take off my broad brimmer to him and say, "Well done, well done!! You have earned 'the laurel wreath,' and I herewith hand it to you, in figurative language." I confess I was skeptical regarding the success of the kinetophone, and held judgment, and, as I am always accustomed to give praise where praise is due, I hand it to the Kinetophone unstintedly. It was beautiful, it was magnificent, and I do not think any critic can say contrariwise. The introductory part took the form of a lecture giving an explanation of the aims and the number of sounds which it is capable of reproducing simultaneously or synchronously with the action. I have seen every talking machine on the market to date, and (with the exception of perhaps one other, which I have not seen in its improved form) I must give the premier place to the Kinetophone. I heard the sound of the voice and musical instruments such as the violin, piano, flute, and horn.



THOMAS A. EDISON.

It was my privilege to be present at an overcrowded audience in the Alhambra Theater, 125th Street and Seventh Avenue, New York. The house was packed from floor to ceiling, and a more appreciative audience I think it would be difficult to find, although it is said that at the Colonial there was a still larger crowd who demonstrated for twenty minutes their appreciation of the device. The same measure of approval was meted out also at the Union Square and other Keith theaters in the city. I shall have more to say on this subject at a later date, when other pictures are added to the initial ones now showing and I have had an opportunity to examine the device more fully. At the present writing I can only reiterate what I have said above—it is good, very good.

I have long been an advocate of the value of the Cinematograph in the educational field, instructing the pupils in the various sciences. The subject is too vast to be treated scantily. So I must await a more suitable opportunity to enlarge upon the theme.

THE EXHIBITORS

IT is very gratifying to me to see the rapid results of that great organization, the National Exhibitors' League of America, week by week. Our columns report its progress, and, as we get our news first-hand, there are no misleading statements contained in our reports. The exhibitors can rely upon the best service of the News to aid them in their cause, and to this end I want to caution the exhibitors of New York City to remain firm to their organization, and those who are not already members of New York No. 1 to become so, and not to be misled by the statements being circulated regarding the formation of another association. This association about to be formed is only with a motive of getting money from the exhibitors with very little return to themselves.

Further than that, it will be an impossibility for an opposition organization to be associated or affiliated with the National. During the past six years I have advocated organization, and I have used threadbare the statement that "Union is strength," "United we stand, divided we fall." At the present time, when adverse legislation is being proposed against the exhibitors of New York City and State, it behooves them to become members of the parental organization, which has helped them so much in the past and is able to help them in the future. So our advice to the exhibitors when they are requested (even with the backing of an evening newspaper, so-called) is to take no notice of the papers handed to them, but place them in the wastepaper basket and give all allegiance to New York No. 1.

Alfred H. Saunders.

GAUMONT COMPANY

The Mardi Gras Carnival at New Orleans furnishes a most elaborate setting for film. The Mardi Gras is one of the oldest institutions of the Crescent City, and indeed, one of the oldest set celebrations in North America, its origin dating back to the earliest settlements of Louisiana.

The Gaumont Company was represented by camera men. The results were seen on the Gaumont "Great Events" release of Saturday, February 15. Because of the fact that the editor had several thousand feet of negative to choose from, he was enabled to produce the unique.

On the same reel were several hundred feet of interesting views showing the re-opening of the Assouan Dam in the Nile Valley. This dam at the time of its construction was to be the largest in the world, but no sooner was it completed than it was found that a higher retaining wall was required to impound the vast body of water. Ten feet has been added. The reopening took place a few days ago in the presence of Lord Kitchener and the Khedive of Egypt. Many prominent Egyptians, as well as numerous English and French visitors, were present. This film has educational value, and will be in demand by schools, colleges and educational bodies generally.

From this company, we have received for our bookshelf, an educational catalog, the first they have issued, which covers all subjects that an educationalist could wish for. Every exhibitor or educationalist who desires a concise program could not do better than consult this catalog, which will be supplied on request to the Gaumont Company, Congress ave., Flushing, N. Y.

"HIAWATHA"

Hiawatha, frequently referred to as the Indian Passion Play, has been made into motion pictures. A four-reel production of Longfellow's immortal epic has just been completed by Mr. Frank E. Moore, who has been presenting the play for several years with an all Indian cast.

More than 150 full-blooded Indians took part in the production.

A private view of the pictures will be given at the Berkeley Theatre, 19 West 44th street, Tuesday evening, February twenty-fifth, at eight-thirty o'clock.

Robert Stuart Pigott will recite the lines of the poem as the Indians enact it on the screen.

An orchestral score of Ojibway music has been especially prepared for the occasion.

Educators, press representatives and state rights buyers failing to receive tickets will be supplied if they will communicate with Mr. Moore, 1212 Times Building, or they will be admitted upon presentation of their cards at the door.

Hiawatha will be reviewed in these columns next week.

Mr. Moore will market the production on the state rights plan.

FIRST EXPOSITION OF THE MOTION PICTURE ART

The following interesting letter from Mr. Samuels will give our readers an idea of the great interest that is being taken in the forthcoming exposition:

New York, February 18, 1913.

Mr. Alfred H. Saunders, Editor,

Moving Picture News,
30 West 13th Street,
New York City.

My Dear Mr. Saunders:

Knowing how much interest you take in the welfare of the coming Exposition of the Motion Picture Art, I take this opportunity of letting you know the different leading manufacturers who have closed contracts for space and some of the novel exhibits which we will have.

The New York Edison Company, through their president, Mr. Arthur Williams, have taken a large space in the Depew Place end of the Exposition hall, where it is their intention to show the different styles of electric signs, lamps and other electrical appliances, including heaters, etc.

The United Electric Light and Power Company, who are making a bid for the business of the Motion Picture Theatres, have closed for a large space near the center of the hall, where it is their intention to exhibit a miniature electric theatre, the design of which will be drawn by one of New York's best architects.

The Precision Moving Picture Machine Company have a large space in the 47th Street side, center, where it is their intention to exhibit the Simplex Machine, with the different parts and auxiliaries.

The Nicholas Power Company have secured another large space just east of the Simplex, where they will show the latest Power Machine, parts, etc.

Eberhard Schneider has a large space in the same block as the Nicholas Power Co.

The American Machine Company have reserved space on the 46th Street side, center, where they will exhibit the Standard Machine, parts, etc.

The Thomas A. Edison Company will exhibit their new model of the Kinetoscope, which will be on exhibition for the first time at the Exposition.

The Oshkosh Metal Products Company will exhibit their Electrical Musical Chimes, with the Burton Piano Attachment, at the Depew Place end of the Exposition Hall.

The Lang's Rewinding Machine has pace in the center of the hall.

The Excelsior Arc Lamp Company (Koerting & Mathiesen Co.), have space in the same block.

The Motion Picture Story Magazine is also in that block.

Scott & Van Altena, slide manufacturers, have closed for space in the front of the building, Lexington Avenue end.

The Newman Manufacturing Company is also at that end of the building.

The Vitagraph Company, Kalem Company, Biograph Company, Lubin Company, Essanay Company, Selig Company and Pathe Company will all have spaces on the 46th street side for reception parlors.

The American Seating Company through their New York manager, Mr. Olmsted, have agreed to take a large space on the Lexington avenue end of the building and are also very desirous of furnishing each of the four "model" theatres with four different styles of their opera chairs.

The Rudolph Wurlitzer Company are closing contract for the largest space sold yet for the exhibition of one of their Wurlitzer Musical Instruments.

The General Film Company, Universal Manufacturing Company and Mutual Film Corporation each have the proposition of one of the model theatres under consideration, and probably will close contracts for same during the present week.

The Manhattan Slide Company have secured a large space on the 47th street side, where it is their intention to give a practical demonstration of the manufacturing of lantern slides from start to finish.

The Novelty Slide Company and the Picture Theatre Equipment Company are both holding space in reservation.

Among other manufacturers who have practically closed contracts for space are Bausch & Lomb (lens manufacturers of Rochester, N. Y.), Hugo Reisinger (the electro carbon manufacturers), The Mirror Screen Company, General Electric Company, the Eastman Kodak Company, Chas. L. Kiewert Company (Bio Carbons), Ansco Photographic Supply Co. (raw films), Andrews Opera Chair Company, The American Photoplayer Company, and others too numerous to mention who are negotiating for space.

A number of foreign manufacturers have signified their intentions of taking part in this great Exposition, and everything now points to the greatest success possible for the First Exposition of the Motion Picture Art, which will be held in conjunction with the Third Annual Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, at the Grand Central Palace, July 7th to 12th, 1913.

With very best wishes, I remain,

Yours very truly,

F. E. Samuels,
Secretary.

SOME ATTRACTIVE GAUMONT RELEASES

There is seldom a moment in a Gaumont release that is without some merit. Recently a very excellent drama was reviewed by us entitled "The Bond of Brotherhood," in which the Gaumont Players did specially fine work. The story is so lucidly told in the action of the piece that a subtitle is scarcely necessary. The central figure in the story is a young woman, beautiful but heartless, and a flirt. It must be said that the work of the young woman who has played the role in the picture is exceptionally fine. Two brothers are in love with the young woman. She flirts with them alternately, causing much sorrow to both. The mother of the young men eventually, steps in just at the critical moment, in time to prevent the union of one of the brothers with the heartless coquette. The figuring of the mother in the story adds a rare touch of pathos to the episode.

SCENE FROM THE BOND OF BROTHERHOOD

Another excellent Gaumont witnessed at the same time was entitled "Kittens." That is hand-colored, and is an irresistable bit of pussy-cat life. This film is a delight to those who have any affection in their hearts for the domestic tabby.

KINEMACOLOR AND BALKAN WAR PICTURES AT CARNEGIE LYCEUM

Each of the two daily Greek newspapers of New York City has recently published an editorial urging every Greek in the city and its suburbs to make a point of seeing the Kinemacolor representation of "Actual Scenes of the Balkan War" at the Carnegie Lyceum, New York City, where these natural color motion pictures are being exhibited twice daily in conjunction with "The Making of the Panama Canal." The stand taken by the editors of "Atlantis" and "The Pan-Hellenic, the two papers in question, is that the Greek Army and its feats so splendidly portrayed in Kinemacolor gives all Americans who see the pictures, a better idea of what a great country is Greece. These pictures have already run for two months at the Carnegie Lyceum, drawing large houses at prices of from 25 cents to $1.50, and promise to run indefinitely, with an occasional change of the war program as new reels arrive from the front.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

About "Idea Stealing"

EVERYONE knows of Charles Klein, the playwright. "The Music Master," "The Lion and The Mouse," are named among his many successful plays. In a recent issue of The Saturday Evening Post, Mr. Klein had a very interesting article descriptive of his methods of work and containing useful hints to ambitious playwrights. The article is also beneficial to picture playwrights and we advise all those who have not read the article to send to the Curtis Publishing Company for a copy. We take the liberty of reprinting one or two pertinent statements from the interesting feature. Klein says: "One great bugaboo that haunts the author is plagiarism. And in most cases this is a bugaboo and nothing more. Editors have got to be shown what you've got—they will not buy a pig in a poke. But take it from me, there is very little 'idea stealing' done. No doubt, ideas are stolen occasionally by cheap and disreputable people, but those worth stealing seldom go to such persons. The suspicion of plagiarism often arises from a lack of breadth on the part of the writer. To illustrate: A writer suddenly awakens to the fact that the Turco-Bulgarian war furnishes good material for the drama. So do about eight hundred others at the same time. They all use the same material and many write from the same angle. The manager selects one, and all the rest cry: 'Plagiarism!' It is difficult to establish plagiarism. One must have something more identical than the general grounds of a great disaster or an absorbing economic question to base his claim on. There must be a succession of events. Not even identical language is proof beyond peradventure of theft. Two editors, one in the North and the other in the South, wrote each an editorial a hundred words long and identical to the last comma. The editorials appeared simultaneously; the editors had never seen each other. Each editor had the same mental training, each was Republican and wrote on a great National issue from the same angle. Though themes are old, it must be remembered that if the playwright goes far enough afield from the beaten path he will always find a brand-new vehicle. No doubt themes lose their value in proportion of the number of plays written upon them. This is because the young dramatists always put the same wrapper on their products. The theme of mother-love is invariably shown by the sick child method, or the wayward son, or the harboring of the outcast daughter against the wishes of the father, and so on ad nauseam. This old theme must be treated from a new angle. Using old themes the playwright must invent new treatment; but it must be effective. For instance, the triangle as a vehicle for carrying the theme of marital infelicity has been worn very thin and the slap-stick farce is a bore unless treated from a new angle."

Klein's play, "The Third Degree," will soon be filmed by the Lubin Company.

The McCloskey Letters

The letters written the Lubin Company by "scrip school graduates," and given to us for publication by Editor Lawrence McCloskey, of that company, continue to cause comment. Mr. McCloskey is one of those intelligent editors who appreciate that we are endeavoring to aid the writers and, at the same time, make editorial duties easier. The names and addresses of the writers were not used. Mr. McCloskey would not violate the ethics of the profession by publishing the names of his correspondents and neither would the Editor of this Department. The letters were published to help others and to prove to them the methods pursued by these "institutions." We can say there is no market for school scripts, but our words carry more weight to many when we cite one of the most reputable moving picture concerns in the business as convincing proof. We have on file here possibly one hundred letters written to us in confidence by those who have been "stung" with correspondence courses. These letters will never be printed, for we consider all letters from script writers confidential unless permission to use them is given in the letters. Occasionally a writer will request us to use parts of a letter, keeping the writer's name secret. This we often do. Readers feel free to write to us, knowing that we betray no confidences. That they do tell us their troubles and confide their ambitions to us is indeed a gratification and we endeavor to answer whenever a stamped self-addressed envelope is enclosed. It is no easy task, this correspondence, but it is a labor of love with us and we deem the time of a special stenographer well utilized in the work. We average ten letters daily from script writers from all parts of the world. One day we received fifty. We are here to help the script writers as best we may, and the many kindly worded letters we receive encourage us. We may state here that we have recently been offered the complete editorial control of two house organs; offers to write "courses" of lessons; cash offers for the names and addresses of our very complete list of script writers; and a lump sum for a text-book; all of which we have turned down because we feel we have a mission to perform. We have been told that we take the "school" question "too seriously." We do not think so. It is a mighty serious matter to the beginners in a new literary field, and hence it is a serious matter with us.

All Make Mistakes

Cheer up! They all make mistakes. If some editor points out your blunders remember that even the wonderful French novelists of a bygone day blundered too. Alexandre Dumas in his "Chevalier d'Hormental" made the excellent Buyat declare in 1718 that his pupil "paints like Greuze," who was born several years later. Balzac makes "Cousin Pons" buy a charming fan "ordered by Mme. de Pompadour," who was born in the very year the artist named by Dumas died. Daudet shows us in "Tartarin" 4,000 Arabs smiling "till 600,000 white teeth glistened in the sun." To blunder is easy and mistakes will come no matter how painstaking one may be.

Enter Mr. MacNamara

Walter MacNamara, late of Merrie England, has joined the Universal Script Department as special writer and editor. He is writing some good comedy stuff for Imp. MacNamara is a playwright of renown. He has a musical number running on Proctor time and is the author of a large number of original vaudeville sketches which have proved popular at home and abroad. MacNamara and C. B. Hoadley are said to be collaborating on a vaudeville sketch that will make 'em all take especial notice. Here is a prominent English author and actor who is not too high-and-mighty to take an interest in the script game, and the game will be improved by his entrance.

A New Resolution

Matt Mereness, the Schoharie, N. Y., picture playwright, has made a new resolution, and a good one. He asserts that hereafter he will cut train-wrecks, shipwrecks, cyclones, earthquakes, landslides and floods from Synopsis and if it is necessary to have a shipwreck, he will let the editor run into it along in the script and then if it only calls for a man floating on a plank, he believes he'll get a check and not be called a wild man. Mereness says he has been fortunate in selling a lot of sure-fire military stories lately. But some time ago he wrote a script in which a few scenes called for a few men in uniforms.

> In my synopsis I said, "After the battle," etc. When the script-reader reached there he stopped. He imagined a battlefield covered with a pall of powder smoke that cost about one thousand perfectly good dollars to burn. He didn't go any further in the script to see there was really no battle at all. Not even a shot was fired all through this war. Then I talked about a train wreck. This came back quickly when if it had been read it would have been seen there was no train wreck. It was explained in sub-title "A Train Wreck and The Results." I had to tell of that wreck to make that character turn up. Can't explain too much and keep synopsis in 200 words.

Mr. Mereness is not a tyro; he has sold at least one hundred scripts, and editors tell me he is a crackerjack on the spectacular military plot. However, we will bet something, that Mereness has been overdoing it—has been too prolific, and hence his output has suffered. That script reader has handled lots of his stuff and reads his work carefully. Mr. Mereness has probably fallen into that mental angle that comes to first class writers occasionally, where they mix up everything and can not turn out good work to save their lives. We advise Mr. Mereness to lay off for about a week and think of the high cost of living. Then return to that script, and eliminate the train wreck and its results and invent some more simple way for his character to come to life. You do not have to stop at 200 words synopsis, either. Three hundred is the limit and is a-plenty.

How He Sold "A Veteran"

New York City writes as follows:

> Three years ago I wrote two scenarios and sent them to about a dozen manufacturers. They came back. I thought I threw them away. About two months ago I started reading the Moving Picture News, took seriously what you said about sticking to it, so looked up the scripts. I sent them out again and again they came back. Then you printed something about the importance of carefully written synopses, and I woke up. My chief attention had been given to the scenes. I did not think the synopsis was of much importance to editors, so mine were—well, sloppy. I rewrote them. Then I sent my two veterans to the Pilot Film Company, whose ad appeared in the News about that time. I sold one immediately. The amount I received was satisfactory when the battlemarks of many defeats were so evident from the appearance of the MSS. My object in writing you is, first, to thank you for the actual benefits I have obtained from your publication. I think it is the best school of all—except experience—for the "would-be."

New York, you had no business to have "battlemarks of defeat" on your MSS. Be tidy about your work and never submit a worn script to an editor. If the script has reposed in the "morgue" for a year or so it should be recopied. We are finicky about clean, crisp work. The appearance of a script counts. Never submit two scripts to one editor at the same time. Now recopy that rejected script nicely, first endeavoring to ascertain why it was rejected, and improving the story, and then submit it elsewhere. We thank you for the other suggestion. Come again.

An Interesting Series

Ralph D. Stoddard, the well-known picture playwright of Cleveland, is writing an interesting and authoritative series of articles on the history of moving pictures for the Cleveland Sunday Leader, of which he is Editor of the Picture Play Department.

Two-Reel Stories

There is an old saying that before a babe can walk it must first crawl is the striking argument put forth by Mr. A. W. Thomas, the clever editor of the Photoplay Magazine's Picture Playwright Department. It is the same way, writes Mr. Thomas, with those writers who are rushing into the playwright's field turning out two- and three-reel stuff only to have it rejected. Better write one successful one-reel play than a number of two- and three-reel plays that are not available. The other day we received a letter from an eastern writer whose letterhead called attention to the fact that he did "not believe in writing cheap, one-reel stories when it was just as easy to turn out two and three-reel subjects" and the pay was so much better. In response to our inquiry, he frankly advised us that he had not sold any of the "easy" kind, but that he felt sure his stories would be accepted. We hope so, but we advise other writers to stick to one-reel stories until they are able to turn out the "get-overable" kind of stories requiring several reels. This is very good advice. A writer should be successful in split-reel and one-reel stuff before attempting the two- and three-reel stories. In one sense of the word, the man or woman who can turn out a clever one-reel play is as good an artist or better than those who devote their attention to the lengthier productions. And, furthermore, the good one-reel story should be worth as much in the market to the author as the ofttimes padded two-reel feature.

A Shaking Up Promised

In these days of wars and rumors of wars in the film camps, more than one shaking up seems inevitable. It is believed that the picture-playwright will profit thereby and that those who can write high-class stuff will find a higher market. If an open market comes, high-class stories will be strictly in demand, for it will mean the survival of the fittest. Are you preparing to be among those who will be able to supply that demand when the time comes? Outside stories are wanted by all editors and directors. Fresh ideas and suggestions are welcomed from whatever source they may come. The editor and director will do anything short of committing murder for a clean, fresh comedy, and modern dramas, convincing and unusual, are demanded. The "star writers," so-called, are seemingly in a rut. The "usual thing" with some few exceptions, seems unending. Study the field and get in the game. The opportunity is here.

In the January issue of The Photoplay Author, C. B. Hoadley, editor and author, gives some good advice.

We take the liberty of quoting:

"This country teems with incidents, peculiar characters, customs and locale that has never been embellished in film.

"You receive your story back with the curt reason 'Too conventional,' and you marvel. You may never have seen it on the screen, and yet the idea has been made to do duty in the picture many times. The average writer of scenarios is a plagiarist—a copyist. He sees a story and immediately sets about to write something along the same general idea, and he is not clever enough to drape it in a new dress—to conceal his theft—and it is returned to him with a reason that it has been done before.

"In your neighborhood there is some rare type; some person out of the ordinary in some peculiarity, a rara avis for a picture play. His type may have furnished material for a magazine story. You have passed him a hundred times without comment, for you are not studying the people you are writing about. You are taking your types from the creations of the brains of others, and it never occurred to you to originate.

At the outset, it is not only advisable but absolutely necessary for an author to equip himself with the tools of trade. A carpenter going to his work has his kit of tools; the plumber his bag, an dthe man who digs in the trench his shovel. The magazine writer has his library, his reference books; his periodicals of the current day, and he proceeds methodically. He studies his subject, hunts patiently and thoroughly for his authorities; walks the streets and studies the faces of those he meets closely for types. He sits for hours and thinks, writes copious notes, rewrites his story and then—in many instances—consigns it to the waste basket, and works out a new plot.

The same is true with the authors who write the spoken and acted drama and yet it has been said that to write the moving picture drama requires a better technique, a more thorough knowledge of the drama, than to write the legitimate drama—for the moving picture story must be interpreted by action alone.

"How are you, gentle reader, fitted to write the moving picture play? Have you an imagination that is constantly conjuring up picture situations? Can you visualize those tense dramatic situations which are the creations of your mind? Have you an inventive mind? Are you of a romantic disposition and has God endowed you with a liberal supply of common sense? Are you a close and discerning student of human nature, and have you read widely and chosen the works of the best authors? Are you so constituted that you can bear to have the cherished creations of your mind make the return journey without giving way to discouragements? Is your mind receptive and capable of development? If you can answer in the affirmative then ask yourself if you are capable of hard work and care to enter the field of picture play writing—without any previous preparation."

THE MESSAGE IN THE COCOANUT
Majestic (2 Reel) February 25th.

THE VIOLIN

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Kinemacolor Release)

THE neighbors had marveled and the old man himself didn't know how he had kept up during his granddaughter's severe illness. With a little relief from one or two women in the same house he had watched by the bed almost constantly.

At first a doctor was not sent for. There was no money to speak of and it was thought that the girl would get along all right with home remedies. But the time came when the old man knew that a doctor must be called. It was then that he sacrificed the only treasure he ad.

Eighteen years before, the girl's father had been killed, and when two months later the mother had died at the birth of the child, the old man was left with the little orphan to care for.

At that time the grandfather was playing a violin in the orchestra of a small theatre. As much as he desired to do so, he could not manage to care for the little baby under the conditions. So he put her in a home which took just such cases, paying a reasonable sum for her keeping.

When the child was four years old the grandfather took her to live with him and all went well and happily for a while. The years passed and the old man's' age began to tell upon him. He lost his position. From place to place he went for a short time and finally got permanent work in a cheap restaurant. The meagre salary kept the man and little girl fairly comfortable, but with nothing left for a rainy day. So, when the girl's severe illness came there was nothing to do but pawn the precious violin.

This violin was no ordinary instrument. As a little boy, many years before, the old man had sat, still as a mouse, listening to the marvelous playing of his uncle. His little heart had beat with painful rapidity at the very thoughts that ran through his mind. Oh, to be able to play like that to own such a violin!

The wish had only partly come true. The uncle died and left the wonderful instrument to the child, but lack of money and opportunity had left his talents undeveloped and he could not reach his goal. But he loved his violin deeply, and only for the sake of the child would he have parted with it.

But now the girl was recovering and the old man was very thankful. As he moved around the room, attending to the little household duties, her eyes followed him with a wistful expression.

"Grandfather," she whispered at last, "don't you think you could play to me today?"

The old man started. "No, no, my pet, not yet awhile. You're not quite well enough yet. Wait a bit."

Each day she asked him and each day he put her off.

One day she called the old musician to the bed.

"Sit down, Grandfather," she commanded.

He obeyed slowly, knowing what was coming.

"I am almost well and you know it, Grandfather. Now I want you to tell me why you won't play to me," the girl questioned.

The grandfather avoided her searching eyes and said nothing.

"I am waiting."

Still silence.

"Grandfather!" cried the girl as the truth dawned upon her. "You have sold your violin for me. Oh, you ought not to have done it, you ought not!"

The old man quickly knelt beside the bed and put his arm around the girl. "I did not sell it, I pawned it, my love," he said tenderly. "And no sacrifice was too great if it saved your life."

"But your beautiful violin! My life is not worth so much," sobbed the girl.

"It is worth all the violins in all the world and a great deal more." The old man smoothed and patted her cheek as though she had been a child.

"Well, we must get it back," the girl insisted. "I will never rest until we do. You have never allowed me to go out to service, Grandfather, but I must go now. I cannot have a minute's peace until I've gotten back the violin."

"We'll see, pet, we'll see."

"No, promise me."

The old man looked into the bright eyes and saw the tears about to flow. "I promise," he whispered.

So when the girl was well she searched the papers for work. She had no experience and could not expect high wages.

At the end of a week she was established as parlor maid in a rich family up-town. Her wages were but three dollars because of her inexperience; but the girl was glad of anything that would help her to recover the beloved instrument.

When the old musician went back to take up his work, hoping to borrow a violin, he found his place filled. Then began the weary round of hunting for work again. The only thing he could find was some copying and that brought him very little.

"My little girl must not work too hard. She must have her own money for her own needs." This he kept murmuring over and over to himself as he worked. So anxious was he to get enough money for the violin, in order to save the girl, that he scarcely had enough to eat.

In the great, rich house the parlor maid was hoarding as unselfishly as the grandfather.

When she had been there for two months, two wonderful things happened almost at the same time. With what her grandfather had saved she would have enough to redeem the violin. This was one thing. The other was the appearance as a visitor at the house where she worked, of a wonderful violinist who was giving several concerts in the city.

To be under the same roof with this great man seemed a marvelous thing, but it was not equal in import to the fact that a few days after his arrival she and her grandfather were going down to get the violin.

Proudly, happily they went into the pawn shop.

"We have come for my violin. Here is my ticket and here is the money." The old musician laid both on top of the show case.

The pawnbroker looked at the ticket. "I'm sorry, this is two days overtime. I let the violin go yesterday," he said.

Slowly the old man held out his hand for the ticket. "Yes, yes," he murmured brokenly, "I had forgotten."

The girl was broken-hearted, for she fel that if it had not been for her the violin would never have left the grandfather's hands.

"Is there no way to get it back?" she pleaded.

"No, Im afraid it's gone," answered the pawnbroker, and they left the shop with heavy hearts.

Sadly the girl went back to the fine house and took up her duties with little heart.

The next morning, after an almost sleepless night, she went about her dusting as usual, but without the interest and joy.

When she reached the music room she purposely left the piano until last. She felt that she wanted to avoid as long as possible any contact with a musical instrument of any kind or anything that would remind her of her terrible disappointment.

When every other article of furniture had been dusted the girl crossed the room to the grand piano. There she stopped and stared. Then she rubbed her eyes. On top of the piano lay the case of her grandfather's violin.

Could it be so? Or was he only seeing a vision? She knew that she was not mistaken in the case, for she was familiar with every little mark on it. Cautiously she put out her hand to touch it. It was real. Hastily she opened the case, and there, just as she had always seen it, lay the old violin. Tears ran down the pale cheeks as the girl held the instrument against her breast.

"Oh, I wonder if it is all right," she whispered. And then, putting the violin to her shoulder, she began to play ever so softly.

But soft as the tones were they were heard in another part of the house. The door opened and the distinguished visitor stood before the confused girl.

"Oh, sir," she stammered, "I beg your pardon. I should not have, I know—but—but—Oh, sir, the violin was my grandfather's." She could say no more; tears choked her.

"There, there," soothed the great musician. "I bought the violin yesterday from a pawnbroker. He wrote me to come to see it as he thought it might be valuable. Tell me all about it, child."

The kindly tones of the man calmed the girl and she told him her story of her grandfather's love for his violin, her sickness and his great sacrifice for her, and their struggle and disappointment.

"And how does it happen that you can bring such tones out of an instrument?" asked the great man when she had finished.

"Oh, sir, that is the violin. I can play only a little that Grandfather taught me."

"My child, only one who is in his soul a musician can bring such tones from any violin. Come, let us take it back to the grandfather."

The girl, dumb with happiness, took the musician to her home.

The old man hugged the violin to his breast and tears of joy ran over his wrinkled cheeks unheeded.

"Oh, what can I do for you sir?" he asked gratefully. "Nothing can repay for this great kindness."

"Give me the privilege of teaching your grand-daughter," replied the musician. "In her you shall realize all your own ambitions."

DE BROCK FEATURE FILM CO.

The Du Brock Feature Film Company of Chicago announces that they have in preparation several wild animal features that are to be released in the near future, and have been gathering material for some time past towards this end. The actual making of the pictures is about to be started.

KING BAGGOTT MAKES GOOD IN "DR. JEKYL AND MR. HYDE" FILM

A great deal of enthusiasm was displayed in review circles over the worth of King Baggott in the Imp production of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde," and certainly this clever and popular actor acquitted himself wonderfully well in the difficult title rôle of the piece. A more remarkable conception of the double nature could scarcely be imagined than that of King Baggott.

"THE DOLL AND THE DEVIL"

Pilot Release of February 27

This is a very fine comedy, and tells of an old toymaker of Nuremberg, who has been trying nearly all his life to make a life size doll that will walk and talk. His only other ambition is to marry his daughter Gretel to a nobleman. His apprentice, Fritz, is in love with Gretel, and she with him. Baron Crosswig, in visiting the toymaker to get a doll for the little princess, sees the fair Gretel and wishes to marry her, but this marriage means that the old toymaker must put up a large amount of money as a dowry, which he cannot do, but he remembers the large sum of money which he has in trust for Fritz, and which Fritz is in ignorance of, and decides to appropriate this money for the dowry. He finally completes the doll, excepting that it will not walk and talk, and the old man is very downcast as he enters the room where the doll is packed in a box all ready for the Baron when he calls. While the old man has been out of the room Fritz and Gretel have been preparing for the Carnival, Fritz in a Mephistopheles costume with a stick of red fire, and Gretel has appropriated the doll's dress, as she has nothing more suitable for such an occasion. When they are about to depart they hear the old toymaker approaching. They hurriedly take the doll from the box, and Gretel assumes its place; Fritz hiding behind a chair. The old man enters, looks lovingly at the doll, and says, "I would sell my soul to the Devil if it would walk and talk." At this Fritz steps from behind the chair, lights his red fire, and stepping up to the old man says, "You said you would sell your soul to me if it would walk and talk." He then proceeds to make the supposed doll, in fact, the fair Gretel, to step from the box, and they hurriedly leave for the Carnival. The old man so overcome falls asleep, and in the morning when he awakes, the doll is back in the box. The Baron calls, and is so pleased with the doll, although it does not walk and talk, that he takes it; and relinquishes his suit, the old man having become conscience stricken and refused to give the dowry the Baron desires. They all join in drinking the health of Fritz and Gretel.

HORACE G. PLIMPTON

Mr. Plimpton, through whose hands the negatives of the Edison pictures go and to whose enterprise in a great measure is due the clean stories issued from this studio, is sailing for Europe on the Campania, and by the time this is in the hands of our readers he will be half way across the waters. He expects to be away for a month or so, and during this time hopes to visit London, Paris and Berlin.

In an interview with him he said, "I have had for a long time, a very strong desire to get some first-hand information as to how subjects are handled on the other side, and as to the way business is done, compared with the American mode of procedure. Besides this, I hope to get some fresh ideas. This is a business trip purely and solely." We interpolated the remark that while it was for business, he certainly would gain a great amount of pleasure therefrom. With a smile he answered, "Yes, probably, but it will take all my time to become conversant with the studios and their workings."

We wished him "bon voyage," and expressed the hope that the knowledge gained would add to the future excellence of Edison productions.

KINEMACOLOR

"Zermatt and Gorner Grat" is truly a beautiful scenic. In this film is shown a panoramic view comprising 50 miles of Alpine peaks. The opening scene gives a general panorama, including the Matterhorn, and continuing to the famous Monta Rosa, which is 15,000 feet high. Three people are photographed standing at the top of Gorner Grat, from which point may be seen 50 glaciers. The finale of this picture is wonderfully beautiful, showing sunset and moonlight near the Matterhorn.

Other splendid offerings of this week are "There is a God," a gripping drama, the scene of which is laid in the heart of the Mojave Desert, California; "The Iron Master," a society drama, laid in France; "Her Crowning Glory," a domestic drama with the rocks and shore of the Pacific shore, and a quaint fisher village for the background; and "With the Japanese Army," from which an excellent impression of the military system of Japan can be derived.

"THE PRISONER OF ZENDA" WITH JAMES K. HACKETT

(Famous Players Film Company)

Reviewed by M. I. MacDonald

Pantomime is the finesse of the art of expression. It is an art which stands alone. It has no prop on which to lean, no sunken reservoir of intonations with which to elaborate lame gestures. The art of pantomime in its most perfect form interprets every thought and emotion of the individual in a language that is unmistakable. The actor shorn of the opportunity of speech accentuates his capabilities, and stamps upon himself the brand of greatness in a masterful interpretation of the silent drama.

Up to date the greatest motion picture dramatic productions have originated in Europe, with one or two exceptions, notably "Oliver Twist" with Nat Goodwin, "The Resurrection" with Blanche Walsh, and "The Life of John Bunyan" with Warner Oland. Following these, not greater in some respects, but of an entirely different character, comes "The Prisoner of Zenda," with more magnificence and depth of stage setting, more marked aspirations toward the artistic in exterior locations and scenic picture effects and more solidity and grandeur in the general composition of the picture than has heretofore been displayed in the American production.

James K. Hackett requires no special eulogizing at the present moment. His work of former years in the drama has marked him as one of America's greatest actors. Every gesture, every pose is that of a master. His work in this particular production is particularly delightful, and the double role which he plays in "The Prisoner of Zenda" affords him ample scope for the demonstration of his unusual powers of pantomime. In the part of Rudolph Rassendyll, "a man who was a king," his appeal to his audience in his manly interpretation of the part, is tremendously strong.

At the private exhibition of the filmed version of "The Prisoner of Zenda" given to representatives of the press, and to friends of the company, at the Lyceum theatre on Tuesday afternoon, February 18th, a most delightful two hours was spent by those present. Mr. Daniel Frohman, previous to the presentation of the picture, addressed the audience briefly but happily. He expressed his belief in the fact that "the power of the drama and the value of acting will always remain pre-eminent." And the confidence with which Mr. Frohman spoke of the moving picture as a medium of education for the poorer classes, and of the opportunities supplied by it for the people of the rural and more secluded districts of the country, to become acquainted with the work of the great dramatic artists of the day, was an inspiration for those present, who are closely allied with the industry.

The Famous Players have told the story of "The Prisoner of Zenda" in four reels of film. The opening scene of the filmed play shows Rudolph Rassendyll, a young aristocratic Englishman, sitting in a room at his club, meditating and smoking. Rassendyll is a relative of the King of Ruritania, a mythical province on the continent, and bears a striking resemblance to him. The remainder of the reel deals with an episode in the history of the monarch, in which Duke Michael, a cousin of the king known as Black Michael, plots against him, being jealous of the king's anticipated relations with Flavia, a beautiful princess of the country, whom the king is to marry. Black Michael in his jealousy plots to stir up resentment against the king among the people, and to prevent the coronation of Rudolph, and thus be crowned ruler himself. With this in view he invites Rudolf, who is much given to hunting and drinking, to his hunting lodge at Zenda, and while there sends him a bottle of drugged wine which the king drinks, becoming at once insensible. Two close friends of the king, Colonel Sapt and Fritz von Tarlenheim, acquainted with the desire of Black Michael to usurp the place of Rudolf, follow him to Zenda, and find him unable to enter upon his royal duties and his impending coronation.

Walking in the woods near by they come upon Rassendyll, and noting his resemblance to the king, beseech him to impersonate him and thus thwart the designs of Black Michael. This Rassendyll agrees to do, and Reel I closes with his acceptance of the proposal.

Reel II deals with the further intrigue of Black Michael in striving to stir up dissension against the king, Rassendyll meeting with Flavia, who at once recognizes a change in the heretofore to her obnoxious personality of the king. His beard is shaven as promised at their last meeting. Intuitively she feels the contact of a new spirit, and the two fall in love with one another. The preparations for the coronation commence. Black Michael, who has learned of the ruse to keep Rudolph in possession of the throne, is on the scene, confused and afraid to raise his hand to stop the coronation proceedings, for fear of the detection of his own misdeeds. The finale of Part II is a series of magnificent scenes portraying the coronation.

Part III portrays the struggle of Rassendyll between love and duty and the victory of the spirit of the true man within him. A series of plots and counterplots now follow one another. In this part also are brought out the finest traits in the character of Antoinette de Mauban, who is in love with Black Michael, ending with the success of Rassendyll's plot to reach the king in the dungeon of Zenda, and the wounding of Rassendyll through the treachery of Rupert of Hentzau.

In Part IV Black Michael is killed by his friend Rupert, and the combat between Rassendyll and Rupert is told in a series of intensely thrilling scenes. Here Flavia confesses her love for Rassendyll, but at the same time heroically renounces him, believing that she must sacrifice her love because the welfare of the state demands that she rule in Ruritania. The final scene of Part IV shows Rassendyll back in the London club room, as in the opening scene of Part I. A vision of Flavia appears to him in the glow of the fireplace; and as he presses to his lips the rose that the Princess has given him, the vision fades, and he sinks again into meditation.

MOVING PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

The National League is in splendid condition. New states are being organized and added almost weekly. Last week the state of Oklahoma was organized in Oklahoma City; also, Arkansas was organized at Little Rock.

South Dakota is the last state to come in, making thirty-four. The League is prosperous and aggressive and wide awake to the interest of the Exhibitors.

Mr. Neff left Tuesday night, February 18th to look after some legislation directly affecting the interest of the exhibitors, in Columbus, Ohio.

Cincinnati Local Number Two met at the Sinton Hotel at 2 p. m. February 18th, and held their annual convention—an enjoyable time and a big banquet.

President Neff, on behalf of the Cincinnati Local Number Two, addressed the Ways and Means Committee of the city of Cincinnati on the importance of passing a graduated license as follows:

AN ORDINANCE

Providing the license of Theatres, Moving Picture Shows, etc., and to amend Section 798 and sub-sections a, b, and c, thereof.

BE IT ORDAINED by the Council of the City of Cincinnati.

SECTION 1: Every proprietor or lessee of any theatre, concert hall or any place of amusement, entertainment or exhibition, except moving picture theatres as hereinafter defined, shall pay a license according to its seating capacity—one seat is 20 inches—as follows:

(a) Those seating less than three hundred persons shall pay a license, if issued for one year, of One Hundred and Fifty Dollars, if issued for six months One Hundred Dollars, if issued for three months Sixty Dollars, if issued for one day or any number of days less than three months, Five Dollars per day.

(b) Those seating three hundred persons and more, shall pay a license, if issued for one year, of One Hundred and Fifty Dollars for the first three hundred seats and Twenty-five dollars for each additional hundred seats or fraction thereof; if issued for six months, One Hundred Dollars for the first three hundred seats and Fifteen Dollars for each additional one hundred seats or fraction thereof; if issued for three months, Sixty Dollars for the first three hundred and Nine Dollars for each additional one hundred seats or fraction thereof; if issued for one day or any number of days less than three months, Five Dollars per day for the first three hundred seats and One Dollar per day for each additional one hundred seats or fraction thereof.

SECTION 2: Every proprietor or lessee of any motion picture theatre shall pay a license according to its seating capacity—one seat in 20 inches—as follows:

(a) Those seating less than three hundred persons shall pay a license, if issued for one year, of Seventy-five Dollars; if issued for six months Fifty Dollars; if issued for three months Thirty Dollars; if issued for one day of any number of days less than three months, Three Dollars per day.

(b) Those seating three hundred persons or more shall pay a license, if issued for one year, of Seventy-five Dollars for the first three hundred seats and Twenty-five Dollars for each additional hundred seats or fraction thereof; if issued for six months, Fifty Dollars for the first three hundred seats and Fifteen Dollars for each additional one hundred seats or fraction thereof; if issued for three months, Thirty Dollars for the first three hundred and Eight Dollars and Fifty Cents for each additional one hundred seats or fraction thereof; if issued for one day or any number of days less than three months, Three Dollars per day for the first three hundred seats and One Dollar per day for each additional one hundred seats or fraction thereof.

A motion picture theatre coming within the purview of this section is defined as a place of amusement exhibiting only motion pictures with one illustrated or spotlight song, to each performance.

SECTION 3: Every proprietor or lessee of any theatre concert hall or place of amusement, entertainment or exhibition shall pay a license of Twenty-four cents per year for each and every vending machine installed therein.

SECTION 4: Provided, however, that all licenses shall be issued for one year, if so requested by the applicant and that no license shall be issued without the consent of the Mayor, which consent shall not be granted by the Mayor, except as provided in Section 799 herein.

Provided further that the mayor may, in his discretion, grant without cost to any proprietor or lessee of any place hereinbefore described, a permit to use such place for not to exceed six consecutive days, for any entertainment or exhibition that may be given for the benefit of any church, or for any benevolent, charitable, educational, religious or purely public purpose.

Places of amusement owned and controlled by the City of Cincinnati and not being operated for profit shall be exempt from the payment of license as hereinbefore provided.

SECTION 5. That said original Section 798 and sub-sections thereof be and the same are hereby repealed.

SECTION 6. This ordinance shall take effect and be in force from and after the earliest period allowed by law.

Moving Picture News,
30 West 13th Street, New York.

Dear Mr. Saunders.

In a recent issue of a contemporary of the Moving Picture News I note a paragraph in reference to the Ohio Censor Board as proposed in a bill introduced by President Neff of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. They state in this editorial that the exhibitors of Ohio are unanimously in favor of this bill. I herewith beg to inform you that the exhibitors of Ohio are not unanimously in favor of this bill, especially in its present form. Personally, I am bitterly opposed to a Censor Board in the state of Ohio, or any other state, and I shall make every effort possible to defeat the bill in this state.

The Cleveland Local of this League has gone on record as opposing this bill very strongly, in fact by unanimous vote at a regular meeting, and it has been telegraphed the governor of this state and its Cuyahoga County delegation asking a hearing on this bill.

I hope the exhibitors throughout the state will read the following argument which I offer against this bill, and if they look at it in the same light that I do, I urge upon them that they ask their members in the state legislature to vote against this bill.

1. In the first place this bill is not honest with the film exchanges when it exacts one dollar for every reel of film, whether it is an original reel or not. When a film has been censored, according to the true meaning of the word, it certainly is not necessary to also censor any number of duplicates of that same reel. This League asks for fair and square treatment from the film exchanges and the manufacturers. In return we should accord the same treatment.

2. The true meaning of "censor" is protection, to the public, not extortion from some one. Extortion in any one branch of any line of business means extortion in another branch of that same line. That is what will happen in this case. The fact of the matter is that the film exchanges, who without doubt will find this tax of one dollar per reel, covering everything in their stock, no matter how old the films may be, a severe one, will come right back at the exhibitors with an increased cost in their service. I ask you exhibitors, are you prepared to pay this extra cost? Do you feel that your business will stand for an increase of say anywhere from 25 per cent to 50 per cent in cost of film service? Bear also in mind that the brunt of this will fall most heavily on the "little" exhibitor.

3. We now have a National Censor Board, composed of representative American citizens. They represent every branch of industry. Do you wish to nullify that Board and their judgment by creating a minor board of censorship? That is what you would do if you were to create a state censor board.

4. This proposed bill to create a censor board in the state of Ohio, also provides for a National Censor Congress, which means that a similar censor board may be created in every state of the Union. What would be the result? Right here I want to say that I agree with Mr. Otto N. Raths, President of the Minnesota State Branch of this League, who says that the result of state censorship boards would result in conflict similar to that now resulting from state divorce laws.

5. To show you that the best legal minds of this country hold the view that a state censorship is in direct violation of existing laws, I refer you to President Taft's action, on February 8th, 1913, when he vetoed the proposed Censorship Bill covering the District of Columbia. The President held that it encroached upon existing laws. In this connection I wish to bring to your attention again the decision of another great legal mind, that of the Honorable William J. Gaynor, Mayor of the City of New York, who wrote a letter to the Board of Aldermen of the City of New York, disapproving the proposed ordinance relative to censorship of motion picture theatres in that city. I ask every exhibitor to read that letter over again. It is comprehensive to the last degree and is especially pertinent just at this time.

6. This bill is being promulgated by the exhibitors of this state of their own volition, as there has been no action by any state or civic authority to prompt such a bill as a protective measure. May I ask the exhibitors, not only of Ohio, but all over the United States, to seriously consider this matter of state censorship of films? Think not only of the present, think of what the future may bring forth in case this bill becomes a law in any or all of the states. It is a serious menace, and now is the time to act. Therefore, I feel sure that if the exhibitors of Ohio will give this matter due consideration they will ask their representatives in the State Legislature to vote against the bill.

To sum it all up, this bill will mean a higher rental service to the exhibitor. An old film that is renting to the exhibitor today for one dollar, will rent for two dollars after the passage of this bill. It practically means a double taxation on all exhibitors by the state of Ohio. By this I mean that exhibitors of this state are largely property owners, and are paying taxes to the commonwealth of Ohio on real estate, chattels, bonds and whatsoever property they may own, the same as any other citizen, and in almost all the cities and towns of this state there is also the license fee which the exhibitor must pay on his business. Why, then, should the state of Ohio impose something in the exhibitors' line of business which will increase the cost of the operation of their business?

Our experience with a censor board here in Cleveland, for the past thirty days, has proven the fact that a National Censor Board is sufficient.

Yours truly,

C. M. CHRISTENSON.

National Secretary.

SOME DIFFICULTIES ENCOUNTERED BY BEVERLY B. DOBBS IN ALASKA

By M. I. MacDonald

Imagine being two hundred miles from land and as many more miles above the Arctic circle and compelled to jump from one floating cake of ice to another, a heavy, unwieldy motion picture camera hugged to you with one arm and hand, while you turned the handle of it with the other, all the time surrounded by infuriated, barking, bellowing, fear-crazed walrus churning up the sea beneath you in their frantic effort to protect their young and themselves from the merciless onslaught of the Eskimo hunters. This is only one of the hazardous situations in which Beverly B. Dobbs found himself in the securing of the wonderful motion pictures of life in Alaska which he has been exhibiting to the United States public.

Every minute tempting fate, Mr. Dobbs stuck to his post until he succeeded in securing several thousand feet of film from which he has selected only the best parts and produced a reel a little more than a thousand feet in length which surpasses everything ever attempted in the taking of motion pictures of sea animal life.

Another time, wishing to secure an animated picture record of Eskimo life at Cape Prince of Wales at the most interesting time of the year (March and April), he left Nome, Alaska, with his outfit on a sled drawn by a string of five malimutes and unattended, headed across country toward the coveted goal—a distance of several hundred miles.

Upon the first attempt, blizzards of so severe a character that neither man nor beast dared face them, made it necessary to turn back and wait for more propitious weather. Success attended the second attempt, however, and he was able to secure scenes from which he composed another twelve hundred foot reel which he has entitled "Eskimo Life at Cape Prince of Wales"—and a more painstaking, thorough covering of the subject could scarcely be imagined; it's all there: the old men, the old women, the young men, the young women, children, religion, occupation, in fact, everything which goes to make up the life of that most isolated section, the most westerly point of mainland in North America.

Upon the return trip, new difficulties were confronted in the shape of broken up trails caused by a sudden rise in temperature as he neared the coast, making it necessary to take to the sea ice, traveling only at night and keeping a constant watch for fear of finding himself hopelessly adrift upon a field of ice which might break away from the shore at any time.

Mr. Dobbs has some twenty thousand feet of choice film which, to use his own expression, he has "culled" out of forty thousand feet and over which he exposed but half of which, owing to bad climatic conditions, static electric markings, etc., could not be used.

New York had the pleasure of attending two exhibitions of these truly remarkable pictures, accompanied by explanatory lectures by Mr. Dobbs, at Carnegie Hall on the evenings of February seventh and eighth. All who attended expressed themselves delighted and anxious for Mr. Dobbs to play a return date.

This intrepid traveler expects to leave shortly for the seal fisheries along the north coast of Newfoundland for the purpose of portraying by means of Cinematography the sealing industry in that country.

Results of this last attempt will be eagerly awaited, as Mr. Dobbs is looked upon as a master in his chosen field of work.

THE KNIGHTS OF RHODES

(Ambrosio 3-Reel Feature)

The recent productions of the Ambrosio Company of Turin, Italy, have been so creditable in every respect as to create considerable comment among American critics. The aspirations of this concern toward the elevation of the moving picture from an artistic standpoint, are undeniable.

True, much is in their favor from the fact that their manufacturing plant and studios are located amid surroundings which admit of splendid scenic and architectural advantages. And the plays which call for ancient historic settings are vastly easier of authentic production in their hands than in the hands of American manufacturers.

"The Knights of Rhodes," a splendid Ambrosio historic production, the state rights of which have been placed on the market this week, is, from a dramatic and spectacular standpoint, superior to many of their former releases. The action of the piece is smooth, and the illusion of the production is not lost for a moment. The role of Marina has been beautifully interpreted by an actress who, though a little heavy for the part, so envelops the character in an atmosphere of sweetness and purity, as to completely erase any likelihood of adverse criticism.

The role of Cadina, the favorite of the harem, is also very splendidly interpreted, a most beautiful and capable woman having undertaken the interpretation of this part.

The story is laid in the year 1522, and treats of the struggle of the brave and noble knights of Rhodes against the Turks, to keep possession of the island of that name. Before assaulting them, Soliman, Sultan of Turkey, sends a message to them notifying them of his intention, and asking a peaceful surrender, to which an answer in the negative is sent. A fierce war therefore takes place, and the Turks, 100,000 strong, attack the town in which the inhabitants and the comparatively small body of Knights have taken refuge. They fight bravely until further resistance is impossible, when the Knights are compelled to surrender.

One of the most interesting incidents of the story is the capture of Marina, the affianced bride of Andreas of Rhodes, along with a number of other prisoners by a band of pirates, previous to the outbreak of the war, and her installation in the harem of the Sultan at his request. Here a number of interesting episodes occur, showing the tragic conditions attending on the lives of the women of the harem. The death and burial of Marina is also a most impressive scene.

MOVING PICTURES FOR EDUCATION OF DEAF MUTES

The Essanay people the other day took a thousand feet of picture film for the American Deaf Mute Moving Picture Committee in beautiful Washington Park, Chicago. Upon invitation of the Rev. George F. Flick, pastor of one of Chicago's largest deaf mute congregations, I attended the operation, and must say I am thankful I did so.

Those who are blessed with hearing and speech cannot conceive of the feelings of awe and pity which take possession of one upon an occasion like this. Standing before the clicking camera, in seemingly manly perfection, with a background of stately stone columns and luxuriant shrubbery, was the soundless lecturer, whose hands, arms and fingers moved with decorum and precision and whose face gave acute expression of peace, war, love, happiness or sorrow, as the different phases of the lecture warranted. But his audience of forty or fifty deaf mutes must have followed him closely, judging by the applause of hand and laughter or moans and facial mirrors of misery. It was truly a wonderful sight, and for the benefit of the readers of the Moving Picture News I will give a few facts which have led up to the necessity of taking moving pictures for the deaf.

Briefly, there are a number of educators of the deaf and dumb throughout the world who are attempting to force other teachers to put aside the education of the deaf children by means of the sign language, by adopting universally the speech or lip-movement system. This is very unpopular with many of the oldest and best professors we have, and they have organized an association known as the National Association of the Deaf, the officers of which for 1913 are: Olaf Hanson, president, 4545 Brooklyn avenue, Seattle Wash.; Anton Schroeder, Minnesota, first vice-president; Mrs. J. S. Long, Iowa, second vice-president; Mrs. J. M. Meagher, Washington, third vice-president; Owen G. Carrell, Texas, fourth vice-president; Oscar H. Regensburg, California, secretary and chairman, moving picture fund committee; S. M. Freeman, Georgia, treasurer.

Those who oppose the lip movement alone in the education of the deaf, to the absolute exclusion of the sign language, have subscribed a fund of $5,000 to pay for moving picture films to exhibit throughout the world to prove their theory that the signs are as necessary to the education of the deaf as is the oral or lip language. They contend that both are necessary, as all can learn the signs and very many can never master the lip movement. This is the judgment of Prof. McGregor, teacher in the high school department of the Ohio School for the Deaf, Columbus, who is one of the experts for the association and who lectured before the camera here. In answer to my question as to the objects and hopes of his association, the professor said:

"The National Association of the Deaf, organized in 1880, has among its objects the preservation of the sign language from deterioration, and to this end it has accumulated a fund of $5,000, which is to be used for the acquisition of moving picture films of stories, sermons, speeches, etc., by experts in the sign language. These will be exhibited all over this country and perhaps in Europe, to stimulate interest in the language of signs and to demonstrate its value in the education and entertainment of the deaf.

"Another object of the society is to eradicate the impostor who poses as a deaf mute in soliciting charity. A real deaf person seldom or never begs. They are, as a rule, honest, self-supporting citizens."

This is the first film gotten up exclusively for the benefit of the advocates of the sign language, and will be followed by others, until the fund shall have been exhausted, when, if it is deemed wise by the committee in charge, another fund will be raised to further promulgate the object in view.

Having a deaf mute son at home myself, I know these people are right in their advocacy of both methods of education, and hope they will fully succeed in establishing the dual method the world over. As a vivid illustration: Among a number of deaf and dumb young men who visit my son there is one whose parents have never allowed him to learn the sign language, but who can "talk" enough to be fairly well understood by hearing people and it is indeed pitiable to see the poor boy stand like a dummy while those around him are having a good time conversing with their hands. My son gave him a card on which were printed the sign characters, but when he took it home his mother tore it up, and he told my son later that he could not visit him any more. And, strange to say, both the boy's parents hear and talk!

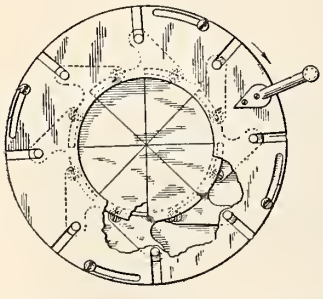
MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City

UEER indeed is the fact that fake legislation is one of the apparently unavoidable evils of our free and enlightened form of government, or attempts in that direction, as witness the introduction of a bill by Mr. Bulkley in the House of Representatives to increase the Government filing fee for patent applications from $15.00 to $20.00—a clear attempt to "carry coals to Newcastle" as obviously, the Patent Office is in no need of money with a surplus of over seven million dollars to its credit in the United States Treasury, and earns more than enough to pay current expenses. As a matter of justice the Government fees in patent matters ought to be reduced, for it is hardly a governmental function or prerogative to extort money from men who, taken by and large, have as a class enriched the country by hundreds of millions of dollars, and who as individuals are frequently hard pressed financially in the start under even the present schedule of fees.

And the moto-picture enterprise is not exempt from this freak legislation evil, as witness the recent attempt at Albany to put moto-pictorial shows on a par with liquor saloons by restricting them to certain prescribed distances from churches, schoolhouses, etc., and this at a time when even the churches are beginning to realize the value of, and welcome the reel film as, a valuable accessory; and witness also the "five minute intermission act" of the Yankee States which is calculated to fulfill its mission if its object is to kill the business. Verily the half-baked legislation proposed by individuals who are woefully or wilfully ignorant of the premises would indicate that they themselves were removed too soon from the oven.

The Societe International de Lumiere Froide (Procedes Dussand), Paris, France, has applied for the registration of "SILF" as a trade-mark for apparatus for the luminous projection of images upon screens, films and photographic plates.



Patent No. 1,049,554, to Earl M. Wooden, of New York, assignor of one-third to Anthony B. Cavanagh, of New York, N. Y., relates to a shutter mechanism for use particularly with moving picture machines or projectors of any kind, and especially with such as employ a powerful light for the purpose of displaying pictures which are printed upon a moving film of highly inflammable material, although the mechanism can be used in connection with various kinds of apparatus. One of the objects of the invention is to cut off the light uniformly and circumferentially from the perimeter of the aperture through which the light passes to the center thereof, so that the observer will view a gradually diminishing circle of light until the aperture is entirely closed instead of having the circle of light obliterated by a straight edge passing from one side to the other. A further object is to provide a shutter mechanism where in an aperture will be uniformly and circumferentially opened from the center to its maximum, so that the observer will view a gradually increasing circle of light instead of a gradually increasing segment of light. The illustration represents a front view of the device, the front disc being broken away in part. The pivoted sectors are cam-operated by a rotative movement of the outer disc.

"Stone walls do not a prison make" when the animated picture film brings respite, as was recently the case at the Joliet, Ill., penitentiary when some five hundred convicts were thereby treated to a glimpse of the outsde world, even though the prison gates were locked and the guards as vigilant as ever. The blessed half hour vacation thus vouchsafed the inmates was another evidence of the efficiency of the moto-picture as a moral agent and source of pleasure and enlightenment. The "lifers" particularly appreciated the innovation; and to paraphrase an old "Before the Fire" Chicago joke, if the Warden approves of the entertainment Illinois convicts may be Joliet.

Patent No. 1,050,511, to Haldor A. Anderson, of Ortley, South Dakota, assignor to Inga O. Anderson, of Bigstone City, South Dakota, for photographic printing frame, claims the combination with a marginal frame having transparent face plate, of a main folding clamping board made up of sections connected together and to said frame by hinges a supplemental clamping bar extending at one side of said main clamping board and transversely of the joints thereof, a jointed joint-stiffening bar mounted on said joint clamping board for movements transversely of the joints thereof, and a spring bar intermediately pivoted to one section of said joint-stiffening bar, and having interlocking engagement with the sides of said frame.

There are various schemes for reproducing the voice by the aid of photography, and they are none more remarkable (sic) than the scheme of a young electrical engineer named Flowers (of speech), who through the medium of a telephone diaphragm proposes to dictate directly to a typewriter (mechanical), and has actually succeeded perfecting apparatus that will segregate and print the vowels and certain consonants. But there is no immediate cause for worry, girls, because certain of the consonants are refractory, the question of punctuation, of capitalization (not only of the copy but of the enterprise also), correct spelling, etc., etc., are yet to be solved before the apparatus can compete with the human typist, not to mention the natural masculine preference for the eternal feminine as a medium of expression.

Although a non-inflammable moto-picture is a desideratum under any circumstances and conditions of use, nevertheless if, as M. Dussaud claims, his "Cold Light" is applicable to Cinematography, the sensitiveness of the film to heat would seem almost of secondary importance. With a non-combustible film and low temperature projective light, safety would be doubly assured, and it is presumably only a question of time when both will be available. Dussaud believes that by the use of his apparatus the cumbrous asbestos-lined cabinets and complicated motion-picture machines may be dispensed with. His apparatus comprises essentially a rotatable disc; a number of small closely coiled tungsten filament lamps, say sixteen, spaced equidistant and peripherally on the disc; a commutator keyed to the shaft of the disc, which causes each lamp to be lighted for about 1/30 of a second only, as it passes a certain fixed point near the periphery of the disc; and a projecting lens positioned to receive the light rays from the lamps as they pass successively.

For moto-picture purposes the disc is rotated at a speed of sixteen or more revolutions per second, so that the optical effect, due to persistence of vision, is that of a continuous unitary light emanating from a given point. By the use of special mechanism it is possible to stop the disc during the twentieth-of-a-second that each lamp is in glow in such manner that the filament is lightest while stationary at the exact focus of the lens. Dussaud claims two important advantages in using a plurality of lamps in rapid rotation, in contra-distinction to the use of a single lamp continuously. Primarily the life of each lamp filament is increased about twenty-fold, since it is in glow only one-twentieth of the time; and secondarily, and of great importance, the bulbs do not have a chance to get hot. The light is relatively speaking "cold" because Dussaud finds that more than twice their normal voltage can be economically impressed on the lamps thus used, increasing their efficiency, and what little heat is evolved is so thoroughly dissipated that the apparatus remains cool. Stated in his own words the distinctive principle of Dussaud's "cold light" is that "This method dissipates the objectionable heating effect of the electric current over a maximum surface where it affords no inconvenience, and concentrates the useful luminous effect on the minimum surface where it is needed."

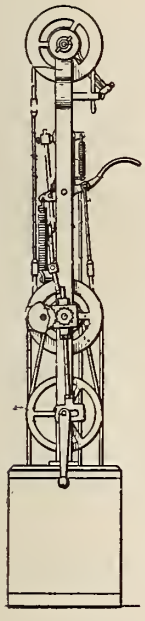
From the foregoing it is obvious that by this method of lighting, the shutter to cover the lens during the intervals between successive pictures may be dispensed with, since the commutator causes the extinction of light during the interval of change. Furthermore, the lamps being very small, round, and compact of film, it is possible to use lenses of short focus, so that the commercial dimensions of the positives may be reduced sufficiently to admit of the production of "pocket" moto-picture machines.

"Apple of Discord"

APPLE versus APPLE, 1 Head (Tenn.), 348. A la William Tell.



Patent No. 1,049,859, issued to Dennis Hensel, of York, Pa., is for apparatus for rewinding films on the primary reel to prepare the same for re-exhibition. The invention embodies a device in which the friction produced when the films are rewound will be automatic proportional to the speed at which the films are rewound, means for automatically causing the reeling operation of the film to cease in case the film should break, means for adjusting the tension of the film during the rewinding operation, and means for automatically stopping the machine when the film has been entrely rewound. Use is made of a frame adapted to receive an empty reel and the reel containing the film which is to be rewound upon the empty reel, means for rewinding the film on the full or secondary reel onto the empty or primary reel, means for controlling the tension produced in winding the film upon the primary reel, means for stopping the rewinding of the film when the same is broken, a platform mounted to swing on the said frame and adapted to receive the broken ends of the film for the purpose of reconnecting the same, and means for stopping the rewinding operation of the film when the last portion of the film of the secondary reel has been wound upon the primary reel.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of the Moving Picture News.

GAUMONT COMPANY SUES FOR INFRINGEMENT OF "THE INTERNATIONAL CONSPIRACY" PICTURE

A very important case on the subject of moving picture copyrights has arisen in connection with the Gaumont Company's suit against Frank Hatch in Pittsburgh for infringement of "The International Conspiracy." The infringing picture was traced to Pittsburgh, and the Gaumont Company in protecting the rights of its licenses in the western district of Pennsylvania brought suit against Frank Hatch for the infringement of the copyright, and Judge Young of the United States Court in Pittsburgh granted a writ of seizure to the Gaumont Company, directing the marshal to seize the copy which Hatch had in his possession and hold the copy subject to the final determination of the suit. The marshal attempted to execute this writ, and Hatch refused to give up the picture. He made various statements tending to throw the marshal off the search for the film. Attorneys for the Gaumont Company then appealed to the United States Court to adjudge Hatch in contempt of court. When Hatch saw that the Gaumont Company was in earnest in the matter he delivered the film to the marshal, and it is now under lock and key in the United States Court, but the Gaumont Company did not stop here. It has pressed its charge against Hatch for contempt of court and on February 14th the matter was argued at length before Judges Buffington and Young by the Gaumont attorneys at Pittsburgh. Judge Young stated to Mr. Owens, the copyright counsel of the Gaumont Company that he regarded the case as a very important one, and that he wished to establish a precedent in this case. He, therefore, instructed Mr. Owens to present to the court an order upon Hatch to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, and Hatch will be given an opportunity to show cause why he should not be punished. The Gaumont Company's attorney is contending that Hatch should not only be fined or imprisoned for the contempt against the court, but that he should be also required to pay over to the Gaumont Company its expenses in prosecuting the contempt case against him. Mr. Owens, in connection with the case, said to-day upon his return from Pittsburgh, "I believe that Hatch is in a very serious position. There is no question but that he is in contempt of court. There are two aspects to contempts. One is the criminal aspect with which we have nothing to do, but which the court takes up on its own motion and involves a fine or jail sentence as the case may be. The other is what is termed the civil aspect, and under this doctrine I am contending that Hatch should be forced to pay the expenses and other damages of the Gaumont Company in connection with the contempt. I have no hesitancy in expressing the opinion that these contentions are well founded, and I confidently expect the court to adopt our position."

An early number of the World's Work will contain an article on Motion Pictures in Education, by Carl Holliday, educational director of the Gaumont Company. This is the fourth article by Mr. Holliday on Cinematography accepted by leading magazines within the past four weeks.

PICTURE MUSIC

By ERNST LUZ

To select appropriate music for a deserving film, or for the purpose of accumulating a suitable repertoire for picture playing, it is essential that a pianist or picture orchestra leader should know the nature of the characters participating in the picture action, designating them in such manner as will suggest to them while reading the synopses of the films (as they appear in the "Moving Picture News" each week), the kind of music they will more than likely need for playing the picture. It should be known by musicians that picture playing should be nothing more than a new addition to the many different kinds of playing in the musical profession, and it is doubly new for the reason that it is not positively required that you be as far advanced, musically, as is necessary in most other branches of the profession for the simple reason that when intelligently selected, you can use a repertoire suitable to your ability, selected and limited by yourself, while in following the profession otherwise, you need be able to play an unlimited repertoire, and are required to be a sight-reader. The latter should be a natural consequence to picture playing, and all musicians should endeavor to master this accomplishment.

The most important of these characters, and those which should influence you in selecting your numbers, are the leads or principals, male and female, the heavy (villain, adventurer or adventuress) and juvenile. The first few words of every synopsis will tell you the nature of the principals and their bearing on the picture plot, and very often the title will give the idea as to the proper music. The heavies will require more care and thought on the musician's part in the playing of the picture, for they are of varied type, and their direct bearing on the picture moral or story differs greatly in weight, and this character is usually the incentive in creating the climax of the picture, wherein lies your greatest musical opportunity. There are dramas in which this character does plotting for no other apparent reason than to interrupt events, evidently to lengthen a story or film, which would otherwise be too short for release. Such a picture is the Lubin Release of January 31st, "The House in the Woods." The entire action in this picture could be musically classed as descriptive, for while the plotting of the nephew, who is cast as heavy, is apparent, nevertheless the action is of so cheap and flimsy a nature, that to have more than a suggestion of plotting in your music would simply cheapen your heavy or depressing numbers, making them less valuable in more deserving pictures. Using a 4-4 number with numerous interchangeable major and minor themes, playing them legato in a slow caprice tempo, will add effect to the dirty work of such a character, always remembering to use brighter numbers for the other descriptive action and closing your picture with a 6-8 movement, starting softly and slowly, brightening and increasing your tempo as the happy ending suggests.

For a good example of a synopsis suggesting music and a picture which beautifully develops the before mentioned characters you need only to take the Edison Release of February 14th, "The Doctor's Photograph." The title will immediately suggest a refined tone, and as you read that this doctor, while practising on the East Side, saves a burglar's sick child after an all night vigil from death, you will know that a pathetic number is needed; reading further you will find that the burglar tries to rob the home of the doctor's sweetheart and there finds a photograph of the doctor, upon seeing which remorse enters his heart, and when confronted by the doctor and his affianced, he expresses his willingness to make amends. This portion of the story will immediately suggest a sneaky number or dramatic pizzicato while the burglar enters the sweetheart's home, an agitato movement (not heavy) as he recognizes the photo and is heard, going into a pathetic as the burglar shows his remorse, beginning your pathetic number at the tableau when the sweetheart enters room through portieres. You are then told that the burglar reforms, for which you can use a waltz, beginning slow and legato playing brighter when the burglar has his position of trust to end of picture.

Reading this synopsis will immediately suggest that you open the picture with a descriptive waltz, or other number having a tone of refinement, going into a slow or sentimental descriptive for the scenes showing the sick child, a descriptive intermezzo while the doctor journeys to his sweetheart's home, and continue to end as suggested above.

Such pictures as is "The Doctor's Photograph" are the ones that will forcibly show you the possibilities of a union of music and the picture, and in a short time when the art of posing and looking pretty is supplanted by good acting (such as is done by Charles Ogle, the burglar in this picture, and all other pictures wherein he takes part) the musical opportunities will be many fold greater.

Mr. Ogle was a musician many years ago, playing bass violin, and it may be that he then created the heart which might now be the means of inspiration in his work. Whether the development of his facial muscles was brought on by the hearing of, let us say, bum notes or discords or possibly by great satisfaction, matters little, for it remains a truth that a musician so desiring could get inspiration from him were he on the screen head and shoulders only. I can clearly recall his character of the counterfeiter with great musical satisfaction. When there is a union of music and the picture such actors will be in great demand.

This article is not meant for the purpose of explaining to you what constitutes a good or poor picture from a musical viewpoint, but to influence you to read and help you in the reading of a picture synopsis, giving you a crude idea of the help it will be to you. Do not feel that I think my suggestions to be conclusive, for they are not and I give them only as basic ideas, which if followed will be creative of a proper musical originality in the picture player, making him a more valuable addition to the picture theatre. More analyses of pictures in this manner will follow, as I feel them of more value to the player than plots.

PICTURE ANALYSES OF MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS

Innocence, by Neil Moret. A Valse Lento movement of merit. Very pretty when played in slow tempo and not difficult. Excellent for piano or orchestra. Excellent in scenes depicting longing, regret, parting and estrangement in romantic dramas or love stories. Class as sentimental number. Published by J. H. Remick, 219 W. 46th St., New York City.

* * * * * * *

Roses and Memories, by Ted Snyder. A semi-pathetic number with a 6/8 and 4/4 movement and an excellent minor movement that can be played agitato and heavy. The number suggests its title and can be used effectively for vision scenes of love and affection and in pictures of mother love or wherein the lead or principal is an old and neglected character. Is not difficult, and good for piano or orchestra. Published by Ted Snyder Co., 112 W. 38th St., New York City.

* * * * * * *

Amoureuse, by Rudolph Berger. An English Valse Lento of unusual merit. Not new, but no picture playing repertoire is complete without it. Beautiful legato opportunities, and is the more effective when played slow. Very melodious and excellent for quiet pictures, creating deep thought, wherein the continuous sympathy of the audience is essential to the picture's success. Sold by Chappell & Co., 34th St., New York City.

* * * * * * *

Imam, by N. D. Mann. An Arabian or Mohammedan Serenade or Intermezzo. Strictly characteristic, and for pictures of such character you will find no better number for descriptive or introductory action. Is in 2/4 and can be played by the average pianist. Is not difficult for orchestra. Published by Jos. W. Stern, 102 W. 38th St., New York City.

* * * * * * *

Arabian Knights, by Frank H. Grey. Called an Arabian Intermezzo, and can be appropriately used in Mohammedan pictures wherein American or European characters figure prominently. Is not strictly characteristic and can be used as descriptive intermezzo in any other pictures when such a number is appropriate. Is not difficult, and very pretty and catchy. Excellent for orchestra. Published by Metropolitan Music Pub. Co., N. Y. Theatre Bldg., New York City.

VITAGRAPH

THE OLD GUARD.—Decorated with the Legion of Honor for his services in the Imperial Guard, under the Emperor Napoleon, on the burning sands of Africa and the snows of Russia, Havresac, the Old Guard, in his second childhood, lives on the memories of his past. His niece, Melanie, works as a maker of artificial flowers, and manages to keep a meagre home over their heads. Two French officers, Captain Weston and Colonel Millard, learning of their poverty and the past history of the old soldier, call at their home and provide for their needs.

Captain Weston falls in love with Melanie and asks her uncle's consent to their marriage. At first Havresac refuses, but later he places Weston's hand in hers and gives them his blessing. Just after this has occurred, the old man hears the playing of the band of a passing regiment, and, looking from the window, insists upon taking his musket and joining the march. He is restrained by the Captain and Melanie, but, to satisfy the spark of his old-time valor, they allow him to stand in front of the window with his musket at "shoulder arms." He becomes so inspired it is too much for his waning strength and he falls into his old armchair and passes through the last great battle of life into the presence of the Great Commander of those who have fought the fight and passed into the Great Beyond.

On the same reel:

GOVERNOR WILSON.—Scenes and incidents about Mr. Wilson's home at Sea Girt, New Jersey, during the recent political campaign for the presidency. Introducing many prominent men of affairs of state, who made up the body politic in the Nominating Committee, notifying him of his selection by the Democratic party. This film gives us a closer acquaintance with the President-elect and shows us some of his home and family relations. At this time—just previous to his inauguration to the Presidency—there will be much interest centred in this very timely and interesting picture.

GAUMONT

THE AMATEUR SLEUTH (March 7).—John Plum Duff, man of millions, receives an alarming message. The note is pinned on a ham tree, and reads: "If the sum of $4.98 is not paid within three days and 3 1-3 hours (2 per cent off for cash within 15 minutes) Beware. The Band of Invisibles." Mr. Duff feels that he is in great danger and he advertises for a detective who can detect.

Herlock Sholmes is a cabbage manufacturer, but the business is not in good "odor" with him. He sees the advertisement and tells his beloved wife that life with a dog, the gold fish and herself is not enough. He tells her that he is going away and he will some day return covered with glory, honor and freckles.

He is engaged by Mr. Duff. The desperadoes, who are trying to painlessly abstract Mr. Duff's money from him, learn that Herlock is after them and he is informed by note that he had better go back to the cabbage foundry, otherwise he is enjoined to take care of his wishbone. The band of Invisibles continue to be invisible until Herlock's eagle eyes get on their track. He finds out that the band is partly made up of the millionaire's servants. He hatches a scheme (by sitting on it).

By a ruse he obtains entrance to the kitchen, the headquarters of the gang. He decides that he will capture them. However, fearful that he would be caught and his wishbone might therefore suffer, he has written to a friend asking him to put his wife in a Dog's Home and to find a washerwoman's job for the dog.

There is a fight when Herlock is found. There is a grand chase, in which he and the gang drop into a river. He finally leads them to where officers are waiting. They are captured. Whereupon Sholmes receives a nifty reward.

THE BOND OF BROTHERHOOD (March 11).—Hubert Barry, a painter, is engaged to Marry Mrs. Walters, a divorcee. He is with her when he receives a letter from his brother. It tells a "hard luck story." The brother asks that Hubert find him a job, to once more give him help. The brother, Maurice, arrives, and Hubert installs a laboratory for his brother, a chemist, near Hubert's studio.

Mrs. Walters is an incorrigible flirt and shows marked favor to Maurice. This flirtation grows daily in danger. Scandal threatens. Hubert is unaware of the duplicity. He learns the truth at a recepion given by her when he finds her in the arms of Maurice. In rage, that his kindness be so illy rewarded, grieved that his love for his brother and Mrs. Walters should be so flouted, Hubert orders Maurice from the house and tells him that never again does he wish to see his face.

Maurice goes to his rooms and packs his belongings. He then enters his laboratory and experiments with new explosives. There is a confusion of chemical elements—an explosion. Maurice, stunned and scorched by the flames, staggers out of the room and falls unconscious.

Hubert, soul wounded, has gone to his mother's house. Although in mental torture, he will not worry her by telling of the deception of Maurice. With his mother he goes to his home. As he enters, there he finds Maurice senseless on the floor. At his side is a note written preparatory to his going away. It is addressed to Hubert and asks his forgiveness for the folly and deception of the brother for whom Hubert had done so much.

His anger partly dissolved, Hubert, with the aid of his mother, revives him. As Maurice slowly returns to consciousness, Mrs. Walters enters. It is a trying moment. Here is he whom she had injured almost irreparably in the heart of his brother and who may now be injured for the length of his life. Mrs. Walters, seeking her own interest, advances to the side of Hubert and tries to retrieve his flown affections. There is one to intervene, one to stop in time the alliance of Hubert with such a worthless woman. It is the mother. She steps between her sons, brings them together in body, soul and spirit. She then denounces the woman who had threatened the bond of brotherhood, waves her out of the door, out of their lives.

AMERICAN

JOCULAR WINDS (Mar. 6).—Mrs. Carlton speculated heavily. Practically every dollar of an enormous income was invested. Her daughter wandering about the big estate, made friends with a charming neighboring girl whom Mrs. Carlton, learning of the acquaintanceship, snobbishly insulted, advising her to stay to herself.

Mrs. Carlton needed another hundred thousand dollars or thought she did, which amounted to quite the same thing with her. The wealthy John Morton was sent for and the transaction negotiated, Mrs. Carlton giving her splendid residence as security.

Going to his automobile after the transaction, John Morton recognized his long-forgotten niece in the doorway of the modest home next door. Recollections of his ill-treatment of her mother swarmed to his mind, and John Morton knew that he was not far from his day of reckoning. He, therefore, entered the little garden and sought by the one means known to John Morton to in a degree make up for the neglect of her mother—he offered her a check. This she refused.

Two months later John Morton passed into the great unknown and left his all to the niece. This included the mortgage on the fashionable property of Mrs. Carlton next door.

A time came when Mrs. Carlton's mortgage fell due, and she was quite unable to meet it. Then came to her the news that the little neighbor next door, whose companionship she had forbidden ner daughter, was the present holder of the note. Mrs. Carlton had her hour of anguish. And then came the little neighbor and, for the exchange of friendship with her daughter, offered Mrs. Carlton the mortgage. Needless to say Mrs. Carlton felt the exchange most keenly.

THE TRANSGRESSION OF MANUEL (March 8).—Manuel, a Mexican of the West, loved his wife more dearly than life itself. He saw her take sick and her ailment assumed an aspect that even to his inexperienced eye spelled death. Desperate, Manuel went to the doctor, and the doctor, kind-hearted soul, came, wrote a prescription and left.

Away to the drug store went Manuel. The prescription filled, the druggist refused to deliver it without money, and Manuel had none. Out again went Manuel, arms flying, his head dizzy with unhappiness. There stood some horses belonging to the boys. Manuel, knowing it certain death, stole a sorrel mare, sold it to a suspicious looking stable proprietor, hastened to the drug store, got his prescription and dashed home.

The wife of Manuel was slowly dying. Frantically Manuel poured out the medicine, but it was too late. Just then the sheriff, leading a band of determined cowpunchers, broke into the room. They were about to seize him, but the sheriff raised his arm. A sweeping glance showed him the true nature of the crime. The dying woman raised her head, stared at the intruders and fell back lifeless. And then Manuel, raising his hands toward the sheriff, announced that he was ready, but the boys, instead, removed their hats and filed slowly out of his room, leaving Manuel, hated Greaser, alone with his precious dead.

LUBIN

AUNTIE'S AFFINITY (Mar. 1).—Marie and her Aunt Amanda live at the Hotel Borden. Marie is in love with Tom, the landlord's son, but Auntie forbids her niece to go automobiling with him. One day Marie pleads a headache and Amanda goes walking in the park alone. Pietro, the chef of the hotel, dressed regardless, also goes to the park. He picks up Amanda's pocketbook and gracefully returns it. Neither have met before; the chef introduces himself as the Count of Montividio, and an attachment is commenced. The chef buys an engagement ring and, losing it in the kitchen, it is found in Marie's plum pudding. The chef is discharged and Amanda is heartbroken until a letter comes from the Italian Consul certifying that Pietro is really the Count and heir to a fortune. Both couples elope.

THE FIRST PRIZE (Mar. 3).—Fishing village, to which comes Duke Mason, a young artist, to paint his prize picture. He meets a lovely young girl, Nell Jason, who falls in love with him, as he does with her. As he paints, she watches and finds fault with his picture so many times that he tells her to paint it, and she takes him at his word. They become engaged, he asking the consent of her father, and they plan many things for the future when the picture is finished. It is finally finished; he leaves her, and tells Nell he will return soon. In the city the picture is a great success, bringing Mason money and friends. He forgets his little fisher maiden and she waits in vain for his return, but the days grow into weeks and months. He left his paint, etc., with Nell when he went away, and to amuse herself she paints. Her father is old, and she feels that she must do something to help along. She reads in a paper of an offer of $1,000 as first prize, $500 as second, and so on, for pictures to be exhibited in some art gallery several months later. She decides to try for one of the prizes. She paints late and early and the picture is finished. She names it "Calling." Mason tries for the prize, but his hand has lost its cunning, and some of his friends tell him of a wonderful picture that did win the first prize. At first he does not want to go to see it, but finally does go. The picture is just a barren part of the beach and, standing on an elevated portion, is a girl with back turned looking across the water with arms outstretched. He reads the title, hears her call, and, much to the surprise of his friends, he leaves the art gallery. At the village Nell is standing on the beach the living picture of "Calling." Mason sees her, comes to her and humbly asks for her to forgive, and, like all of her sex, she forgives.

EDISON

ALL ON ACCOUNT OF A TRANSFER (Feb. 26).—In trying to explain to a big, fat German who has recently arrived in this country, how and where he is to change street cars to get to a certain address, a conductor gives

Herr Frantz Muller a transfer, telling him to follow a lady who is sitting ahead of him to whom he has just given a transfer for the same car.

Arriving at the crosstown line the lady, who is followed by Muller, discovers that she has forty minutes leeway before her transfer expires and decides to do a little shopping. Muller follows her everywhere. She becomes suspicious of him and tries to evade him by rushing into a busy bargain store, but Muller sticks to her trail like Old Sleuth, the detective, never losing sight of her for a moment. At the shirtwaist counter, where great reductions are offered, the persistent Muller creates a sensation among the shoppers when the lady he is following screams for help and has him arrested.

At the police station Muller tries to explain in his own tongue but the Irish sergeant cannot understand him and is about to confine him to a cell when the lady, upon learning Muller's motive in following her so persistently, withdraws her charge and, understanding German, acts as his interpreter, has him excused, and also volunteers to direct him to the proper car. Now they understand each other they become good friends, and the last seen of them is on a crosstown car with Cupid on the job.

On the same reel:

THE NEWEST METHOD OF COALING BATTLESHIPS AT SEA (Practice Drill in New York Navy Yard) (Feb. 26).—Many pictures have been shown of battleships in holiday attire, decorated in brilliant colors, passing on review before the high officials of the Government and officers of the navy, or decked in their best for the reception of visitors, and we think this picture is especially interesting by way of contrast, aside from the novelty of the operation.

We see the battleship North Dakota taking coal from the collier Cyclops by means of an ingenious device which lifts six large bags, each holding about one-half ton of coal, from the hold of the Cyclops and transferring it by a trolley line of about two hundred yards to the hold of the North Dakota. We are also shown close views of the engine which operates the trolley and automatically takes up the slack in the cable in such a manner as to insure rapid and accurate operation.

Through this picture the general public will get some idea of the vast amount of fuel required to furnish the power for these monsters of the deep.

A WILL AND A WAY (Feb. 28).—Being the eighth story of "What Happened to Mary," produced in collaboration with "The Ladies' World."

In the previous "Mary" stories our readers will remember that her newly-found uncle and his son were arrested for the embezzlement which left Mary without a home and again thrown upon her own resources. We see her now as a public stenographer.

Mr. Foster, a lawyer, has her write a letter to Abraham Darrow stating that a new will is ready for his signature but that the son, Terence Darrow, prevents the lawyer's access to the old man's bedside. Mary immediately volunteers her assistance in getting into the house and having the will signed.

Terence Darrow sees Foster and Mary coming out of the office building and follows Mary to his home in time to prevent her entering. He then goes in, sits down, lights a cigarette and sends the old housekeeper out for some whiskey. Falling asleep, his cigarette drops from his fingers and sets fire to the rug. Mary, in the meantime, goes into the alley and slips in the back way when the old housekeeper comes out. She is detected by Terence attempting to steal through the room and a terrific struggle ensues, but Mary escapes to the yard again and gets the bottle of whiskey and a shawl from the old housekeeper by a trick and re-enters, this time being successful in escaping detection.

She locks Terence in the room, reaches the old man and gets the will signed just as Terence breaks into the room.

The fire caused by the cigarette has meanwhile gained such headway that the firemen have their ladders up and one of them reaches the window just in time to knock Terence down as he attempts to wrest the will from Mary.

The fireman then picks Mary up and starts down the ladder but is followed by Terence, and a desperate fight takes place on the ladder. Terence, in an endeavor to kick the fireman off, loses his balance and falls to the ground.

The fireman brings Mary safely down. She quickly recovers consciousness and takes the signed will to Mr. Foster. The picture is full of thrilling action from start to finish.

KNIGHTS AND LADIES (March 9).—Chester and Pearl are sweethearts. Grace and her beau, Belmont, call on Pearl while Chester is there. Belmont pays a whole lot of attention to Pearl and makes Chester jealous. After Belmont and Grace leave, they quarrel and Chester leaves angry. They are each on the point of telephoning the other for forgiveness, but neither will give in. At last Pearl, visiting Grace, unburdens her story of the quarrel and Grace determines to bring Chester to Pearl. She leaves Belmont with Pearl and leaves for Chester's apartment. Meanwhile Chester has capitulated and called at Pearl's house. The maid informs him she is visiting Grace. He rushes there and, seeing Belmont talking to Pearl, rushes in. Grace, meanwhile, has dozed off while waiting for him, and she does not see him until he has taken two swords off the wall and left. She follows. Chester goes right back and makes Belmont fight a duel with the swords. Belmont is just about to run his sword through Chester when Pearl hits Belmont over the face with a pillow, ending the duel. Grace returns and orders Pearl and Chester from the house. They both go and, upon arriving home, renew old friendships and vow never to quarrel again.

On the same reel:

MA AND THE BOYS.—Percy calls on Violet. Her mother must sit in at all conversations. Clarence calls and presents flowers to both mother and Violet, and immediately jumps into favor. Percy dislikes Clarence and does not hesitate to show it. The next time he calls Percy brings flowers for both ladies also. Clarence also calls and brings a large box of candy for each of the ladies. Mother invites them in for a bit of supper. Clarence suggests eating some of the candy just as Percy has the pepper box in his hand. Percy volunteers to get it and sprinkles a goodly portion of the contents of the pepper box all over the candy. He brings it in and he and Clarence and Violet all take some. Immediately they are seized with sneezing fits and compelled to take refuge in the lemonade to quench their burning thirsts. Violet and Percy exit into the parlor, where they make up and she forgives him. Meanwhile Clarence is having a hard time explaining that it was not his fault, and mother proves that she holds nothing much against him by proposing to him. He can do naught but accept and go into the parlor to find Violet in Percy's strong arms, and, when all hands explain the double engagement, everything ends well.

A screamingly funny farce, unique in its conception, and very forcibly portrayed. A real laugh producer.

FRONTIER

A RACE FOR LIFE (March 6).—In this story, entitled "A Race for Life," we find ourselves entangled in a beautiful love story permeating with a show of supreme devotion on the part of the petite and charming little Edythe Farney, "the cutest little Irish lassie the sun e'er shone upon," quoting the language of her devoted sweetheart, Larry Peyton, a stalwart and handsome young civil engineer, who had for the past two years been pestering the life out of Edythe to say "yes" to his proposal of marriage. As our story opens we see Edythe sitting in the telegraph office taking and sending messages, for her vocation is that of telegrapher on the Santa Fe Railroad, at a little town in the hills of Mexico, holding a happy conversation in between ticks with her sweetheart Larry. He finds it hard to tear himself away from her side to go to his duties, twenty-five miles away, at the Gordon surveying camp, where he is employed as superintendent in the clearing of rough territory and the surveying of same, which are the preliminary steps for the building of a large iron works. As he is about to say good-bye, Grace, the eight-year-old sister of Edythe comes running in, crying as though her heart would break, holding fragments of her broken dolly in her hands. She is folded into the arms of Edythe while Larry wipes the tears away from her large brown eyes and tells her not to cry that he will bring her a dolly the next time he comes to town, a great big one that goes to sleep and closes her eyes when she is laid down. Smiles take the place of tears and Larry leaves the two little sweethearts smiling and happy. On his way to the camp he stops in a store and buys the dolly he has promised little Grace, which the storekeeper places in a nicely packed wooden box. We next see him superintending his work at the surveyor's camp. Coming across a bunch of his men who are neglecting their work and playing cards, he censures the foreman, who resents to the extent that he aims a blow at Larry. Larry knocks the foreman down. The men come to the foreman's aid, but they find the young engineer made of the proper material that brooks no resistance to his will. They are cowards and go back to their work with the exception of the foreman, who is discharged and goes away grumbling that he will get revenge. Larry goes into the rough, temporary shanty that is his office. Telegraph instruments are there, and his knowledge of telegraphy has permitted him to hold conversation with Edythe many times while miles and miles apart. There are few of us who know how many dots and dashes there may be in the telegrapher's code that frame that beautiful line that has since the beginning of men made beautiful history—"I love you"—but we do know, all of us, the thrill of ecstatic bliss that thrills us when the person whom we feel we love better than any other human being, speaks those three words to us, and judging from the happy smile that overspreads Larry's face as he receives an answer to his hurriedly sent message, we judge he may have asked the question and got that sweet reply. While he is thus happily engaged he hears a slight noise at the door. He closes the key, goes to the door, picks up the paper and reads the words: "Take a tip from a friend. Look out for Bill Dalton, your foreman, and his gang. They are after you to do you bodily barm. Yours in haste. A Friend." Before he can realize just what it can mean, he hears footsteps approaching and the voices of men swearing "get revenge." He opens the door to see hurrying toward the cabin, Dalton and his crowd of toughs. He closes the door, bars it, and as Dalton and his gang knock for admittance he asks them what they want. They tell him to come out or they will break the door down; that they are going to teach him a lesson he will never forget. Larry warns them away. In answer a gun is fired and a bullet comes through the door. Larry rushes to the single window, bars that, places the furniture against the door, shouts to the men that if they break in they do so at their peril, for he will kill the first man that shows. A happy thought strikes him. He rushes to the instrument, opens the key, and a call goes over the wire for the station where Edythe is employed. Edythe answers. He tells her of his difficulty. She tells him that she will get help to him as soon as possible, and rnshes out of the office, burries to the dispatcher's office in search of her father, who is an engineer on the road and whose engine is waiting with steam up to assist the California Limited up the grade; it is due there in twenty minutes. Her father cannot be found. She rushes up to the engine, tries to persuade the fireman to start the engine to go to the assistance of her sweetheart. The fireman refuses to go without the consent of the engineer. Almost crazed with fear of what might be happening to her sweetheart, Edythe hardly knowing what she is about, climbs up into the cab of the engine, calling to some of the railroad men who had gathered, to come with her if they had any manhood left in them. She rushes to the throttle, pulls the lever, the great monster starts to move and gains speed with wonderful rapidity. The engine dashes out on the main track with a half dozen men clinging and climbing up on to the engine. Her wonderful courage inspires the men witb admiration, and, as the engine rushes with tremendous speed along the rails, they can do hardly less than hold on with all their might, for the swaying of the engine tells them the speed is terrific. The scene switches to the surveyor's camp. The door is being battered down. One of the toughs attempts to make an entrance. A shot is heard from within. Witb a howl of rage, the man falls back with an ugly wound in his left arm. The scene changes to the oncoming, madly rushing engine, looking more like a spectre, for the steam is escaping with a noise like the hiss of a snake. As the cabin is reached the engine is brought to a standstill by the plucky little woman, and, heading the men, she rushes toward the cabin. The door has been broken down, and the gang have rushed in upon Larry, and, as the girl, with the men following, rushes up to the door, they find a peculiar spectacle confronting them. Larry is standing with his back to the wall holding above his head a box with the word "Dynamite" written on it. They turn, and as they are rushing out they are confronted by the men who come to the rescue. They are captured and made prisoners. After the tumult has subsided. Larry quietly removes the lid from the box marked "Dynamite" and takes tberefrom the pretty big doll that he has promised to Edith's little sister. The word "Dynamite" he had written while the men were struggling to break down the door.

REX

THE STOOL PIGEON (March 6).—Young Walsh, the assisting prosecuting attorney of a big city, is very much in love with Roma Bonnelli, an artist's model, whose naturally beautiful temperament has raised her above her station. Her whole heart goes out to this progressive young man, and she is afraid to tell him that her brother is the one-time crook, Dago Joe.

Joe loves his sister and has turned informer. Roma tells Joe that Walsh has proposed to her and he promises to reform with her help.

Dago Joe's erstwhile companions, Red, Slim and Steve, are aware that Joe has turned informer, but do not know that he has decided to reform. They determine to revenge themselves upon him. Red and Steve both pay attention to Minnie, a tough character. This causes bad blood and a clash, and in an ensuing fight in a line, Red kills Steve, shooting through his pocket. Red escapes. He tells Minnie and Slim of the happening and they decide to fix the blame on Dago Joe. They take his coat from a peg and substitute Red's, and Joe is caught by the police, while looking in surprise at the revolver and burnt hole in his coat. He is arrested.

Roma reads of his arrest and knows that at the time of the murder Joe and she were together talking over his future. She visits him in his cell and offers to prove an alibi. He refuses, believing that it would cause a rupture between his sister and Walsh.

The case comes up and Roma listens to the evidence and sees Walsh gradually getting Joe in deeper water. Unable to stand the strain she makes a dramatic statement regarding her relationship with Joe and why he did not claim an alibi.

Walsh proves his manhood by claiming Roma, and he extends a friendly hand to Joe.

NESTOR

BIG BOB (March 4).—Big Bob and Dick were friends and both were anxious to find favor in Jessie's eyes. However, when Bob learned that she preferred his friend, he agreed to give him all help possible in securing the consent of her father.

The old man had firmly made up his mind that Jessie was to marry Frank Bardly, so Dick was an unwelcome visitor. Jessie refused to have anything to do with Frank and wrote Dick a note which she took to their little post-office in the old tree, telling him she would elope with him, while her father and Frank followed to read the note, and, upon learning its contents, decided to lock Jessie in her room and come themselves to the trysting place and give Dick a sound thrashing. Dick overheard their plans, however, and promptly secured Big Bob to take his place, and as a result it was father and Frank who received the thrashing and made to run for dear life in the bargain. In the meantime, Dick had broken the lock on Jessie's door, and the young people were being made one by the very minister that father had brought to marry Jessie and Frank—and upon their return to the house—Big Bob saw to it that Frank made a hasty exit while father quickly, if unwillingly, gave the young people his blessing.

POWERS

EPH'S DREAM (Mar. 5).—Eph is a black man of the crap shooting variety. He is industriously engaged in his favorite occupation of crap shooting and hoping for big winnings. He fares badly in the game and goes home. His mind still dwelling on his imaginary winnings, he goes to sleep and dreams.

He finds money on the street, oodles of it, meets a "swell" wench, visits the swellest cafes and throws money around promiscuously and is the ideal of his class.

But finally the crash comes. He awakens and comes back to the actual things. He realizes that all his fun was only in his imagination and is one disappointed coon.

He wanders out from his hovel, back past the old crap game and, hoping to realize something on his dream, he makes a "grab" at the "stakes." He is successful only for a while. The "bunch" start after him and, after a lively chase, catch him and give him a ducking in a ncarby water trough.

LUX

PAT AS A BIRD FANCIER (Feb. 26).—Nearly everybody in your audience will have read of the celebrated Parisian bird charmer, who attracts much attention in the Tuileries Gardens. Pat sees this gentleman and desires to emulate his example. He purchases some birdseed and commences operations. After a series of exciting adventures he comes to a large cage. Pat thinks that this gives promise of a bird of considerable dimensions. The promise is realized, but the bird has four legs, and Pat flies in terror from the angry lioness, who chases him through the town.

On the same reel:

ARABELLA AND THE WIZARD.—Arabella's husband is a cabby. A bad attack of gout causes him to absent himself from the office, and Arabella is obliged to take his place.

During her experience as a cab-driver she encounters an Oriental, whom she belabors with her whip. The Oriental turns out to be a wizard, and his magic powers enable him to give Arabella an exciting time. Several good examples of trick photography are introduced into this subject.

ECLAIR

THE CRIMSON CROSS (Three Reel Feature) (Mar. 5).—The American people have shown by their unqualified endorsement that they liked the "Passion Play" and "The Holy City." This feature now presents a magnificent production with this same atmosphere, which will certainly be one of the great successes of the year. This feature also possesses a powerful plot of the American Puritan times.

Past artists of stagecraft have had charge of the mammoth tableaux of this production and every detail of the many scenes is perfect.

A cast of unusual strength portrays the leading characters and the scenic settings and effects are superb.

First of all this feature, "The Crimson Cross," compels one to think, and while the charmed eyes are busy following the artistic and tasteful settings, the mind cannot help but wonder at the admirable strength of the plot which reunites, at the foot of the cross, two human beings of different religions.

These early days in New England were days of thrills and action. The Puritans marched to and from their churches with their guns under one arm and the Bible under the other.

In this feature we have the life of the Puritans as a main theme, with a wonderful presentation of the meaning of the "Rosary." These beautiful symbolic tableaux will prove a positive delight to the lover of the best in photoplay work.

The captain of a Spanish vessel enters the house where Giles Corey, his wife, Martha, and his daughter, Priscilla, are enjoying a peaceful day at the fireside. He is selling the merchandise brought over by his ship.

The Spaniard did not fail to notice the beauty of Priscilla. Coming back, he found her alone, and shows her what he thinks to be the most interesting to the girl, the box containing the jewels. Among the jewels is a rosary. Priscilla does not know what the use of this is, and smilingly the captain is about to explain when armed Puritans break into the room and arrest him. They believe he has been making love to the girl.

Priscilla in vain tries to free him, but succeeds only in being locked up also. There, enclosed by the gray walls of the prison, the Spanish captain shows the first bead of the rosary and there appear before the enchanted eyes of the Puritan's daughter "The Mysteries of the Rosary."

The Joyful Mysteries.

1st. The Annunciation by the Angel of the Virgin Mary.

2nd. The Visitation of Mary to Elizabeth.

3rd. The Nativity—Birth of the Saviour in the stable, surrounded by the adoring Magi and wondering animals.

4th. The Presentation of the Infant Jesus to Simeon at the Temple.

5th. The Boy Jesus at the Temple confounding the priests by His wisdom, led forth by anxious parents.

The Sorrowful Mysteries.

1st. The Agony of Christ in the Garden of Gethsemane.

2nd. The Scourging of Christ in the courtyard of Pilate's palace. The soldiers urged on by the angry mob.

3rd. The Crowning of Jesus with Thorns, much to the joy of the howling populace.

4th. Jesus on the way to Calvary, carrying His Cross, followed by the jeering mob and a few faithful ones not daring to show their sorrow, save one, St. Veronica, who gives Him a cloth to wipe His face, and the miracle of the Agonized Face appearing on the cloth.

5th. The Crucifixion, where we depart from the usual view of Christ on the Cross and instead give the rending of the curtain in the temple, which, as it falls, discloses the old city of Jerusalem, and outside the walls on the fatal mount are seen the three crosses with their victims thereon. An astounded priest views the scene, then, turning to Heaven, asks which is the true God. The sky darkens, lightning flashes and smoke issues here and there.

The Glorious Mysteries.

1st. Roman soldiers casting dice for the raiment of the Christ are surprised and horrified by noises; the raising of the lid of the tomb and Christ issuing forth and ascending into the air.

2nd. The Ascension. Mary and Christ's disciples repaired to the spot appointed by the Saviour. He suddenly appeared in their midst and with final instructions slowly ascends into Heaven.

3rd. The Descent of the Holy Ghost upon Mary and the Eleven Apostles.

4th. The Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, slowly ascending to Heaven accompanied by angels.

5th. The Crowning of the Blessed Virgin, Queen of Angels and Saints in Heaven.

And now we see the prison again. Believing that Priscilla has been bewitched, the Puritans seize the captain, tie him to a stake and are about to burn him alive when a man runs in and cries out, "The Indians are upon us." The women flee in terror and the men rush to meet the advancing foe.

Juan begs Giles to release him and let him help fight the Indians.

Later we see the return of the Puritan warriors. Abner has a wound in his head. All assembled, they miss the captain, and Abner deliberately lies and says he saw him flee.

Priscilla, stung by this monstrous tale, accuses Abner of lying. Giles, in his fury, orders her out of the house. She leaves and we find her, rosary in hand, on the battlefield, seeking the captain, whom she finds dying. She gives him the rosary, and he dies in peace.

Priscilla returns home, and at the window her mother tells her that Giles is relentless. As Martha leans over she read the passage which Giles has just been reading in the Bible, and beckons Priscilla in. The little maid steals down in front of her father, but he rises in anger and is about to hurl his denunciations upon her when Martha reopens his Bible and points to the passages:

"For if ye forgive their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you."

"But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." Matthew, 6:14-15.

Giles reads and, turning to Martha, says: "You are right." He extends his arms and folds his daughter to his bosom.

RELIANCE

THE BIRTHDAY CAKE (Feb. 26).—Mr. Gladwin, an old man, has one son, Jack, of whom he is very fond. This boy wants to go abroad and finish his studies in music. His father has saved the money but does not want to tell the boy until his birthday. One night Jack finds the money and, thinking of his ambition, he feels justified in taking the money. He leaves a note for his father saying only "Good-bye." The old man is heartbroken—all that night he sits alone before the fire with his boy's photograph in his hand. Looking into the cupboard he sees Jack's birthday cake—the one he had bought to surprise him on the day he was to give him the money. He loses his mind and peers into the face of every young man who speaks to him—he is looking for his son. Every night he gets out the cake and lights the candles and waits for the boy who never comes. The doctor says he is dying of a broken heart and nothing but Jack's return will cure him. And in Paris, Jack, overcome with remorse, decides to return. He enters the old home to find the cake on the table with the old man crouching near. Jack counts the candles and realizes. Falling at his father's feet he pleads for forgiveness—reason is restored to the mind of the father and, with loving kindness, he welcomes his son home again.

THE LURE OF THE CITY (Mar. 6).—Marion Grey, a pretty and talented girl living in a small town, sings in the choir and is happy in the love of Bob Molton, a manly young fellow who has courted her since childhood. Marion is ambitious; she leaves the simple village to seek success on the stage in the metropolis. Here she has the usual struggle and, after many bitter efforts, she yields to the temptation of fine clothes and an advance in her theatrical work through the influence of a millionaire "first nighter," Charles Bowden, who showers her with favors. Back at her home her mother becomes ill and Marion is oblivious to the call of the old scenes. Her neglected sweetheart, Bob, comes to the city to urge her to return to her dying mother's side. He sees her at the theatre and his heart aches at the thought of his sweetheart exhibiting her face to thousands and degrading, in his eyes, her wonderful voice by using it in a vulgar musical show. But far worse; when he waits for her at her home, begging her to return, he is made well aware of Bowden's influence. It comes to a choice between them, and by his fine personality and splendid simplicity, which rises above the narrower, more selfish infatuation, he takes her away from the millionaire back to the town where she was born—back to her real home, and just in time to save her mother from the grave and herself from what would have been worse.

THANHOUSER

SHERLOCK HOLMES AND THE "SIGN OF THE FOUR" (Feb. 25).—Major Sholto, a retired British army officer, who had amassed wealth in India in a very mysterious manner, died suddenly, and his two sons were unable to find any trace of the wealth which they knew their father had possessed. But they searched the house patiently and at last, in an attic, concealed by a secret panel, they discovered a brass-bound box. Eagerly they opened it, and to their delight they beheld jewels of almost fabulous value.

But besides the gems, they found a letter telling them that Mary Morstan, the orphan daughter of one of Sholto's brother officers in India, was entitled to an equal share in the treasure. Thaddeus, the younger brother, was willing to carry out his dead father's wishes but Bartholomew, the elder, insisted that they alone should possess the jewels. Finally, Thaddeus, unable to persuade his brother to relent wrote Miss Morstan an anonymous letter telling her that she had been wronged, and naming the place where they could meet.

Miss Morstan, perplexed by the strange communication, consulted Sherlock Holmes, the celebrated detective. Holmes and Dr. Watson, his associate, kept the appointment with Miss Morstan and were led by Thaddeus Sholto to his home. Thaddeus told Miss Morstan of her inheritance, and explained that he intended to force his brother Bartholomew to surrender her share of the treasure.

They reached the Sholto mansion, and Thaddeus Sholto went to his brother's room to summon him. But soon he came dashing downstairs, pale and terror-stricken. One glance at his face was enough. Holmes and Watson dashed up the stairs, burst open the door leading to Bartholomew Sholto's room and rushed in. There, huddled in his chair, was Bartholomew Sholto and on his breast was a torn sheet of paper, with five words scrawled upon it, "The Sign of the Four." And the treasure was gone!

One of the secrets of Holmes' great success was that he lost no time following a clue. A quick examination showed that the man had been killed by a poisoned thorn which had lodged in his head; then the detective, realizing that the murderer must have escaped by the roof, hurried up the ladder leading to the roof.

In the garret Holmes came upon fresh evidence of intruders. In the heavy dust which had gathered upon the garret floor were impressions of a man's boot and the ferrule of a wooden leg, and the imprint of two little bare feet. The detective hurried to the roof, where he found, dangling to the ground below, a heavy rope, the means by which the criminals had escaped.

tracked the fugitives down, the chase finally leading him and his co-worker, Dr. Watson, to a little shipyard, where he learned that a man with a wooden leg, accompanied by a little East Indian, had hired a motor boat and sailed up the river. Holmes, in another boat, pursued.

The fugitives were captured, but not before they had thrown the treasure overboard. Then Jonathan Small, the man with the wooden leg, and his faithful follower, little Tonga, whose deadly blow pipe had killed Sholto, were brought to Holmes' rooms and the casket opened. The jewels were not there.

And Jonathan Small, with the prospect of a long prison term before him, laugbed grimly, for the treasure had disappeared forever.

WHEN DREAMS COME TRUE (Feb. 28).—The young owners of a California orange grove loved each other, hut they were unhappy because their lives were so narrow and circumscribed. Each dreamed of wealth and prayed continually that it might come.

Sometimes dreams come true, and in this particular case they did. Wealth came to the couple and they were in a position to gratify their every fancy. A young couple from the East gladly leased their grove and the original owners went to a large city, expecting to spend the remainder of their days in luxury. Within a year, however, they were tired of their new life, hut each was ashamed to tell the other so. While the husband was absent on a shooting trip the wife received a letter from their tenant, who also had been disillusioned. The tenant was sick of oranges and longed for "that dear Broadway." Under the circumstances the woman saw her duty clear. Her husband returned, weary after his outing, to receive word tbat his wife had gone back to the orange grove "to look after the property." He followed her there, found her in an old gingham dress and sunbonnet, thoroughly happy because she was again settled in the land she loved. It might he added that he was heartily glad to join her.

There is a moral to this episode. It is that wbile dreams come true sometimes, we sometimes find out when they do that our judgment of what we want is bad.

RAMO

MOVING MOTHER (Feb. 26).—The ceiling falls in the sitting room of Mamie's flat and the janitor is just as worried about it as janitors generally are. This angers Mamie, who is an independent sort of small person, and she hustles out and rents a new apartment. She arranges with the moving men to come in a couple of days for the things. Mamie's mother is a helpless sort of hypochondriac and her nerves need soothing constantly. The excitement of the day is too much for her and she takes an overdose of chloral. She is still asleep the next morning when the van men come to tell Mamie that they have a hetter joh for the next day and that she must move at once or get another van. She moves, but mother sleeps through it all and is moved along with the sofa on which she sleeps. The men spill her a couple of times, but they do not muss her up much. The frësh air and the shaking up wear off the effects of the drug and she wakens to find herself alone in a strange house. The drug has not entirely worked off and she promptly concludes that she has been abducted. She runs for the police, who make a thorough search of the apartment and capture the innocent little Mamie. While the disgusted policemen steal out mother gets more nerve quieter and sinks back to sleep.

NOT LIKE OTHER GIRLS.—Laurie does not realize that she is about twelve years beyond the kittenish stage of her life, but she can't help noticing that she weighs 185 pounds and has a foot more waist than usually is found on the sweet young thing she wants to be. Some of the girls tell her that they keep in trim at the gymnasium, and to the gymnasium Laurie goes to put through a heroic course of sprouts. She doesn't like the gymnasium, hut she does like the handsome instructor, and she sticks to the exercises until she gets a black eye trying to box. To comfort her the instructor puts her on the scales to show how much weight she has lost. She has gained another five pounds. This is the first straw. The instructor seeks to comfort her and she accepts it as a proposal of marriage—and accepts him, too. He accepts her when he finds that she has money, and so the gymnasium course brings a husband to Laurie, though not in the way she had expected it would.

GREAT NORTHERN

AN OLD MAID'S LOVE.—Professor Hart has a winsome daughter, Erna, and likewise a maiden sister who is fast approaching middle age. The professor receives a letter from Jack Hendon, the son of a lifelong friend, announcing that he has completed his examination and is about to spend a brief holiday at the Hart villa. Rose, who is the "old" maid, is overjoyed at the news and dons her best frocks in order to greet young Jack Hendon. Upon the latter's arrival Rose showers attentions upon him, while Erna, to all outward appearances, simply looks upon him as an ordinary visitor come to spend a few days in the country. But he manages to arrange a game of tennis with the young woman, and while they are engaged in batting the hall across the net, the old maid appears and attempts to take part in the game. Her awkwardness causes her to stumble and fall, hut Hendon gallantly goes to her assistance. Later during his visit Rose manages to lose her balance while seated on a rustic bench during the progress of a lunch—and again is saved from embarrassment by the timely action of Jack. In the meantime the latter and Erna become greatly attached to each other and announce their engagement in the presence of the disappointed Rose. On the night of the wedding and after the ceremony, Jack remains with his father-in-law and a friend and several good healths are drunk. But during the merriment he has forgotten the number of his apartments and, through an error on the part of the boot cleaner, he mistakes Rose's room for his own and enters. Aroused from her slumber the spinster turns on the electric light and Jack hurriedly heats a retreat. There is a commotion immediately and the guests rush from their rooms to learn the cause of the uproar. Jack's young wife and her father are disinclined to take his explanation of the mistake, but after he has shown that his wife's shoes and those of Rose had been misplaced all is forgiven. The stupid hoot cleaner is then summoned and promptly ejected from the hotel.

KINEMACOLOR

THE ALCHEMIST (Two Reels).—A strong drama laid in the days when the alchemist and astrologer were supposed to read the past and foretell the future.

Quaint costumes, beautiful scenery, fine acting combine to make this powerful story one which grips attention from start to finish.

An alchemist has hrewed a powerful poison, also experimented on an antidote. A prince and courtier, come to the house to learn of their future, see the alchemist's daughter, and hoth fall in love with her. The girl, dreaming of the handsome strangers, forgets her pet dog; he drinks from the bowl of poison and is dying. Her screams hring the father. Eagerly he tries his antidote—it works—the dog is saved, the alchemist is triumphant.

In the castle the prince longs for the girl. With the aid of his friend he steals her and places her under a lady-in-waiting in a room in his castle. There he tries to woo her without success. His friend enters the girl's room and attempts to take her in his arms. Frightened, she flies to the prince for protection. He tells her his love is honest, and that on the morrow he will ask her father for her hand in marriage. With a heart full of hate the false friend goes to the alchemist and gets poison, telling the poor heartbroken father it is for the prince. The courtier puts the poison in water; the girl is dying. In this condition she is discovered by her lady-in-waiting. The prince is told and, heartbroken, falls beside his dead love.

Meanwhile, the father consults the stars. In them he sees his daughter's peril. Taking the antidote he climbs through a window in the castle and saves his child. When the priests and courtiers come with the prince and his friend to hury the girl, she rises and denounces her would-he murderer. The priests who came to hury the girl marry her to the prince.

NU-FORM CORSETS AND LARRYMADE WAISTS.—In this reel of the Kinemacolor Weekly Fashions are shown close views of some of the new styles of corsets, as exhibited on living models. Some wonderful effects are produced by posing the models against black backgrounds, giving a wonderfully fine stereoscopic effect and hringing out the fine lines of the corset perfectly.

Larrymade waists show many novelties in advance styles of waists.

scenery taken in the vicinity of the Manacles, a line of dangerous rocks along the coast near the Lizard.

Mullion Cove is next seen. This is reputed to be the headquarters of a band of smugglers, now happily extinct. An excellent picture shows a coastguard gazing out to sea through a telescope; he is standing on the edge of the cliff and the sea, a wide expanse, lies at his feet.

St. Michael's Mount is a rocky island some distance from the mainland. Upon its peak is a fine old castle. The town of St. Ives is next shown. It is the chief winter resort of the West Country. Views of the harbor are given. A group of "old salts" on the quay.

Newquay is then visited. This is the principal town in the Cornish Riviera. Children playing on the sands. A family group.

MAJESTIC

SHIRTS AND SHOCKS (Feb. 23).—Just before a swell wedding the groom spoils his last dress shirt and the others are already in a hopeless state—owing to his nervousness. He chases his groomsman through the house to beg, borrow or steal a shirt for him. The groomsman gets into the bishop's room and sees a shirt, but once he gets it into his hands, he sees that it would be useless, for it is merely a clerical shirt bosom.

In the meantime a burglar breaks in, lured on by the accounts of the wedding presents in the daily newspapers. He is well dressed and mingles with the guests. He sneaks into the room where the presents are displayed and, as he looks up from the wonderful array of gold and silver, he finds himself confronted by the groomsman, gun in hand. He drags the burglar into the groom's room and, pointing to the thief's immaculate shirt, he says, "This is just what we want!" They drag the shirt from the struggling burglar and in a moment it is on the groom. The groomsman asks what he shall do with the thief. The groom dismisses him with a wave of the hand. How can he be bothered with mere trifles when he is about to be married? They point to the window and the fellow dives through, pausing only to remark, "You're nothing but a set of crooks!" before he gets out.

THE MESSAGE IN THE COCOANUT (Two reels) (Feb. 25).—Dick Ellis is in love with Edith Morton, daughter of a millionaire. Her father does not approve of Dick—for he wants his daughter to marry a count in the French diplomatic service. The girl will not even listen to this, as her heart is given to the American. Dick is kidnapped by some friends of the count and shanghaied aboard a vessel bound for the South Seas.

Edith waits and waits—but no word comes from her absent sweetheart. Her father and the count tells her he has deserted her.

The ship on which Dick is catches fire. He swims to shore, the sole survivor. He finds himself on a cannibal island, inhabited by cannibals, who want to burn him at the stake. But when he carelessly opens a pocket cigarette lighter they show fear and decide he must be a "white god"—to be treated with great respect. They make him their chief—and at the head of the army Dick leads his tribe forth to victory in many battles.

But all the while he longs for the sight of a white face and prays for the day when a ship will carry him back home to the girl he loves.

One day he writes a note and seals it in a cocoanut, which he flings in the sea, hoping it will be picked up by someone able to read and understand his message.

Several months later the cocoanut is washed up on the beach at Coney Island, and Dick's plea for help read. A ship is sent after the man on the cannibal island.

With a happy heart Dick sees the vessel making its way to him. He bids farewell to his faithful warriors, who loudly lament their chief's departure.

When Dick arrives in New York the first thing he hears is that Edith is being married to the count that day. Jumping into a motor car, he makes his way to the Morton home, where he arrives in time to prevent the ceremony, denounces the count, and claims Edith as his own bride.

NOW I LAY ME DOWN TO SLEEP.—

"Now I lay me down to sleep;
I pray the Lord my soul to keep.
If I should die before I wake
I pray the Lord my soul to take."

At the opening of this little heart story we see two little tots at their mother's knee saying this well-known evening prayer. They jump into bed and fifteen years later we see them, the man and the woman, kneeling at the bedside of their dying mother. The mother's last words to her children are: "Follow the straight and narrow path," and with this earnest hope on her lips she passes into the great beyond.

Six years later we see the brother drinking and worthless. We see the sister happy, happily married to a business man, and with a cute little tot to increase their joy. The brother falls into bad company in a saloon and is taken to a den by a band of thieves. They tempt him to join them in the burglarizing of a house, and in his weakened condition he accepts.

That night the sister is putting her little tot to bed and, as it is saying its evening prayer, "Now I lay me down to sleep," the brother enters the house and starts to rob it. Through the curtain he hears the voice of a little child saying the prayer he used to know so well. For a moment he becomes a good man again and goes to the curtain and listens. On the other side the sister sees a hand creeping through the curtains and, as the baby says its prayer, the mother, overcome with fright, slowly draws a revolver from the drawer, and as the man drops the silver he has stolen she shoots through the curtain.

Her own brother falls into the room at her feet. She takes him into her arms and he, gazing into the eyes of the sister he has not seen for so many years, asks her to have her baby say the evening prayer once more. Down on her little knees the baby falls, and as she comes to the lines, "I pray the Lord my soul to keep," before the eyes of the unhappy man comes the vision of over twenty years ago as he and his sister knelt and said that selfsame prayer. Then as the vision fades away and he and his niece say "I pray the Lord my soul to take," the soul of the poor, weak man passes into the great beyond.

PUNCH

BOBBY'S BUM BOMB (Feb. 27).—Bobby's father buys a large bowling ball, which interests his son very much. The boy manages to steal it and after inserting a piece of rope to look like a fuse, he has a great deal of fun frightening the neighbors with the supposed bomb. After he has scared the cook out of her wits, and stolen the pies, chased a tramp off the grounds and reduced the minister to a hopeless state, he is caught by father, who soon transfers the bomb to a harmless ball. But when he threatens Bobby with a spanking, the wise little boy says he will tell his mother about the pretty ladies father flirted with. So instead of a whipping he receives a dollar to keep quiet.

On the same reel.

TRACKED TO FLORIDA.—This picture shows, Tom, Dick and Harry, the now famous comedy sleuths, on another case, requiring their gravest attention. They assume their various disguises, and follow a notorious criminal to Florida, finally capturing him with their usual cleverness.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

Two weeks ago President Robert Goldblatt addressed a large audience numbering thousands at Palm Garden, New York City. It was at an important event, the entertainment and ball of the M. P. M. O. U. of Greater New York, Local No. 1, and he was telling his hearers how important it is to co-operate, and one good turn surely deserves another. He is a man with a big heart, and it can be said of him that he is the Lincoln of the picture machine operators that make up Local No. 1. He is staunch and true, also severe in his rulings, loyal to his obligations, and is ready at all times to return good for evil, as well to forgive his antagonists and enemies.

For many years he was the head of the Operators' Union when an auxiliary to Local No. 35, and when called upon by his fellow men to represent them at national conventions he was on the job for their benefit and not as many others might have been, as I dare say, for the benefit of themselves.

Now to get to the point. He signed tbe proclamation that gave freedom to his constituents from the misrule of Local No. 35 and formed what is now known as M. P. M. O. U. No. 1, an organization be is proud of, and a successful one. Local No. 35 started a new branch called Moving Picture Department, and again I dare say it is not the success that they expected it would be. After quite some pleading the new department of Local No. 35 was given its own officers, with the exception of the treasurer, and that official acts for both Local No. 35 and department or branch. Here is what I call very poor judgment, and by no means is it unionism, and not only that, but as others term it, disgraceful. A little more than a year ago the musicians employed on the Fox circuit in New York went on strike, witbout a doubt for just cause, and demanded what was due them; also the Auxiliary, now known as Local No. 1 Operators, refused to work in sympathy with the musicians, as well as the spot light workers of Local No. 35, and T. P. Union stage electricians. It was very hard to get men to operate moving picture machines in the houses declared unfair, and the moving picture operators worked very hard to win the struggle. Dick De Costa, as everyone knows, was employed at the Greater New York Film Rental office, a Fox concern, and he went to work scabbing at the theatres declared unfair to organized labor. He was the backbone of breaking the strike and was despised by all for this mean, contemptible work, actually helping to starve out his fellow craftsmen. Many poor, innocent children of the operators were going hungry and half clad while their fathers were sacrificing all to help their brother members and the musicians gain their point for justice whereby a better living could be made so as to enable the head of the family to bring up his little ones and give them a better cducation that would in after years guide them in the path of prudence and virtue and help them to a livelihood. This man, Dick De Costa, was accepted into the ranks of Local No. 35, into the new department, and made president of that department. Can you think of a man of such cbaracter to be at the head of a body of men called union? Let me refresh your memory and go back three or four years ago to Beethoven Hall, on Fifth street, near Third avenue, New York. The Operators' Union had an open meeting for all operators to be present and enroll in the ex-Auxiliary, and I might say there were something like five or six hundred there, and our worthy president of the A. F. of L. paid us a visit, "may God grant him many happy years," and this man, Dick De Costa, took the oath of office as business representative of the Auxiliary before our worthy president of the American Federation of Labor, who told Dick De Costa his obligation and said he hoped the operators would be proud of him. Can you imagine this very man, De Costa, sworn as a delegate of a union, to turn on bis organization and become a strikebreaker? Is there anything more disgraceful than that, and what kind of judgment does Local No. 35 of Spot Light Workers use when they allow a man like De Costa to hold the office of president of their new department? I should think that the so-called department will soon realize what is before them and what a comparison this man is to the honorable president of M. P. M. Operators Union No. 1 of Greater New York. Why, it is like the devil toward an innocent babe in comparison. There is much more to be said, but my space is limited in this issue, and in some future issue I will continue where I now leave off.

RALPH J. KNASTER,
Bus. Rep., M. P. M. O. U. Local No. 1 of Greater New York.

Tbe regular meeting of the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union, Local No. 1 of Greater New York, was held last Monday, February 17, 1913, at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street. President Robert Goldblatt called the meeting to order at 12:30 a. m. The final report of the ball committee was the first principal business disposed of. When Brothers Rickards and Freedman arose to make their respective reports tbe body greeted them with applause. President Goldblatt, at the conclusion of the report, recalled the brothers to the rostrum and in behalf of the organization presented them with a token of appreciation for their splendid work in the shape of diamond-studded lockets suitably engraved. Brothers Rickards and Freedman were so taken by surprise that it was with some difficulty they could find words to express their gratitude. Finally they managed to pull themselves together and each pledged themselves in an address that they stand ready at all times to offer their services for the benefit of the organization, irrespective of whether they are officers or in the ranks.

Brother Freedman, who was chairman of the ball committee, took occasion to thank the various committees who assisted in making the recent entertainment and ball an unqualified success.

President Goldblatt then turned over to the organization, in a few appropriate words, the banner that Brother Ralph J. Knaster presented to him at the affair at Palm Garden. The body accepted it witb a rising vote of thanks, and Brother Al. Mackler moved that the body shall pay homage to the banner of our organization. Brother Michael Polito was appointed standard bearer, amid the plaudits of the assembled members. President Goldblatt then appealed to the body to take steps to assist the striking garment workers of New York, and at his suggestion it was decided to hold a theatrical entertainment at some Broadway theatre and the proceeds to be donated to the Garment Workers' Union. A committee was immediately apoointed to look after the matter. The committee consists of the following members: Brotbers B. A. Freedman, chairman; John Rickards, Alfred H. Saunders and Ralph J. Knaster. Tbe next business taken up was nominations for officers. The following officers were unanimously renominated and practically re-elected, as there were no opponents: President, Robert Goldblatt; vice-president, James Daisie; treasurer, Robt. Levy; recording secretary, George Epstein; sergeant-at-arms, Ed. Spinalo, and business representative, Ralph J. Knaster.

The meeting was adjourned at 4 a. m.

Next regular meeting of the M. P. M. O. U. Local No. 1, March 3, 1913, at Teutonia Hall, 66 Essex street.

Election of officers and a reading of the constitution and by-laws. A full attendance is requested.

A FEW WORDS ABOUT FILM MERITS

Selig

"Bill's Birthday Present" is a very laughable comedy, simple and decidedly Western in atmosphere. The ranch boys are invited to Lottie's birthday party. Bill goes out to town and buys a dainty pair of slippers for a present for her, enclosing a note which reads: "Here is a present for you Lottie; Am sure they will fit you." The laugh comes when Bill makes the presentation in person and it is discovered that the boys have substituted a huge pair of rubber boots in place of the slippers.

Biograph

"Father's Lesson" is a lesson for everybody on the liquor question. Splendidly staged, the story is intensely thrilling, and the actors have done credit to fine directorship.

Essanay

"Across the Great Divide," from Essanay, is also well staged. There is not a moment in this story that is without interest, from its opening scene out on the Western plains. There is the illness of the mother, the devotion of the little child, the tender care and faithfulness of the husband, the human touch in the hearts of the bandits—all of this goes to make this film one of special interest.

Gem

"Billy Joins the Band" is farce comedy, with Billy Quirk in the lead. In its class it is not without merit, and will doubtless excite much mirth.

Champion

"The Duke and the Actor" is only fair from the viewpoint of the story-teller. The duke is poverty stricken, the actor loans him money, then later on usurps his identity, with the natural consequences and complications which succeed in being quite amusing.

Rex

"Two Thieves" is very excellent. The care and artistic effect with which this film has been produced place it among the finest of present day releases.

Bison "101"

"The Coward's Atonement," with Ethel Grandin in the feminine lead, is a wonderfully produced military subject of Colonial days, for the splendid staging of which we have to thank Director Frank Ford. The ensemble work in the battle scenes of this pictuie, with bomb explosions, gun smoke, destruction of life, property, and general confusion, is most remarkable. This is an excellent film to be exhibited on any occasion.

Imp

"Now I Lay Me Down to Sleep" is full of human interest. The simple pathos of the subject appeals strongly. This film also is fit for any occasion, and might be shown with impunity before child audiences.

Itala

"The Aerial Disaster," from Itala, is exceptionally fine from a photographic standpoint. The big scene of course is the drop of the burning aeroplane. The scenes in this film, which are supposed to have been laid in America, are so thoroughly European as to cause ridicule on this side of the water. This latter is without plausible excuse.

Lubin

"The Rest Cure" is good comedy. Very acceptable indeed.

"The Lost Son" is a drama of exceptional merits. It treats of the life of a young man who, thinking that he had killed a comrade, spent his life in disguise until through a chance meeting with a young brother he is at last restored to his family.

SASKATCHEWAN MOVING PICTURE EXHIBITORS' ASSOCIATION

Under an act passed by Order in Council at Regina, the Provincial tax on moving picture theatres has been raised. A movement is now in progress to take steps to have this exorbitant tax reduced to such an amount as will be equitable to both the Government and the exhibitor. For this purpose and other matters pertaining to the welfare of the exhibitors in Saskatchewan there was organized in that city on Jan. 12th the Saskatchewan Moving Picture Exhibitors' Association. Every theatre in Saskatoon has joined the Association, which will be permanent and for the benefit of the members who can see the mutual advantage of joining the Association. On application for membership a check covering the annual fee should be sent, made payable to Secretary S. M. P. Ex. Assn., and mailed to the headquarters, 20 Willoughby Block.

THE EDISON KINETOSCOPE

Are your profits being eaten up week after week by the cost of repairing your moving picture machine? If so you might as well make up your mind right now to do one of two things—either go out of business or get the machine that is built to last—the Edison Kinetoscope.

The Edison Kinetoscope stands up to the work day in and day out, month after month. It soon saves its cost over a cheap machine by the saving in repair bills alone. And it operates easily, simply and economically—projects pictures that are clear and rock-steady. If you want to go the easiest, quickest road to prosperity, go with the Edison Kinetoscope.

THE EXHIBITOR

NOWADAYS the poor exhibitor seems to be "between the devil and the deep, deep sea." He seems to be harassed by reformers and buffeted from pillar to post by city officials, until, poor man, he hardly knows whether he can call his soul or his theater his own. What with children's bills, censorship boards, fire restrictions and remodeling, he is a pretty hard-pressed individual. His advisers are legion, but all the advisers have an eye to the main chance, inasmuch as they are looking to their own pocket. The usual question comes up, If I patronize these exhibitors, or if I boost their cause, what is there in it for me? These, and sundry lawyers, are trying to make great capital out of the various movements as above mentioned; trying to frighten the poor exhibitor into all manner of things, so that they may pocket their fees out of his extremity. It is perfectly true legislation adverse to the exhibitor is being proposed in practically every large city in the States, and the only way to fight against these adverse methods is organization.

It is often a wonder to me why these very eminent and right reverend gentlemen do not call into their comcil some of the exhibitors' associations and discuss the matter pro and con for the mutual benefit of both parties; then some method might be found to strike the happy medium. Censor boards of various degrees of goodness or caliber are being formed, all with a view of eliminating films that are unfit to be exhibited before women and children. It was very interesting to watch the experiment in Cleveland, where, on Wednesday, February 19th, the figures regarding the city censorship of films were made known. Samuel Bullock, of the Lake Shore Film Company, reported the city had inspected 133 films handled by his company, containing 121,000 feet of pictures, and out of this large number the censors, Messrs. Bartholomew and Hunter, had rejected only nine feet of film. These figures are accurate and show the high class of subjects made by manufacturers.

The censors above named are acting under temporary arrangements between Mayor Baker, the film exchanges and exhibitors Exhibitors had no voice as to the men appointed, both of whom are idealists, both claim to be sociologists, and both are deeply interested in child welfare and similar work for the moral uplift of the masses. This result of the first thirty days' test of releases in Cleveland show conclusively that the moral cleanliness of the daily program is beyond criticism. I take it that the programs are the same the whole country over, and this first record of actual figures in Cleveland should be taken advantage of in other cities, and exhibitors should fight to a finish any attempt at censorship other than that already acknowledged throughout the trade.

State censorship will give results as demoralizing and diverse as one can imagine, and IF the censorship can be eliminated or kept away from politics and from any special legislation much good will be accomplished. I am sure all my readers will agree with me when I say that such a result of nine feet out of 121,000 is not worth troubling about. It shows conclusively that the manufacturers are fully awake to the conditions which confront them; only let the exhibitor have a voice in the selection of his program indiscriminately among all the manufacturers, and the results would be such that the legislation proposed in the nature of children's bills and such like ilk would become obsolete. The voice of the purist would be silenced, and the exhibitor would be left in peace to follow out in his own way the trend of his aspiration.

One great help to bring this about will be the solidification of every local league into the body of the National. Reports from all over the country show that new organizations are being formed under the wings of the National. All this is as it should be, and I am looking forward to the day when the exhibitor shall become the main arbiter of his own fate, both collectively and individually. To this end a great step forward can be accomplished by every exhibitor setting aside April 8th to aid the National organization, and incidentally that of his own State. This idea originated at the semi-annual National Vice-Presidents' Conference at Columbus on January 22d and 23d last, when the following resolution was unanimously adopted:

> Resolved, That Tuesday, April 8, 1913, be designated as Motion Picture Exhibitors' Day, and that all members of this League in every State are requested to contribute 10 per cent. of their gross receipts on that day for the purpose of carrying on the splendid work now being done by the League; 5 per cent. to be sent to the State Treasurer for the benefit of each State League, and 5 per cent. to be sent to C. M. Christenson, secretary, 703 Euclid avenue, Cleveland, O., for the benefit of the National League.

What does such a resolution mean if it is not adopted by every individual exhibitor throughout the country? Nothing, absolutely nothing, but if every man will do his duty on April 8th it will result in such an influx of money into the funds of the exchequers that the National League will become the most powerful organization for good throughout the world. Just let us get a little into figures and see how it will work out. Assuming that every theater in the country on the average takes in on April 8th $100 (a very small percentage surely), 10 per cent. of this means $10. There are approximately 10,000 theaters in the country. This means a collection of $100,000. Divide this up into half, $50,000 goes to the National, while the other $50,000 is divided among the States. It is only a little thing; it is a mere drop in the ocean. Not a single member will miss it, and yet what a vast amount of good can be accomplished in the hands of the various officers and organizations. This money, carefully handled, would do more to combat adverse and uncalled-for legislation than can be accomplished without it. How much better it will be when every exhibitor is free from such grandmotherly laws as are already on the statute books of the States?

I, personally, have visited about half the theaters of Greater New York. I have watched the crowds, I have taken note of the pictures, and while some of the pictures are silly in the extreme and poor photographically, also in the general make-up, yet, on the whole, the audiences, men, women and children, have been well pleased with what they have seen. The power of the picture to educate the children is, as I have said many times before in these columns, one of the most powerful levers the educationalists and, incidentally, the exhibitor can use. They are a pleasure and a delight to the children wherever exhibited, and in my opinion it is a sin and a shame, a crying shame, to debar children from such harmless, innocent recreation, such as is provided by the various exhibitors in New York City.

"Lives of great men all remind us,
We should make our lives sublime,
And, departing, leave behind us
Footprints on the sands of time," is a quotation from one of the greatest of poets, and what better means could be employed than depicting on the picture screen lives of contemporary men of to-day, all to be used in the education and advancement and good of the various audiences in the Cinematograph theater? Science in all its branches, astronomy, and I would that the ancient mother of astronomy—astrology—might be taught by the aid of the picture. When we take into consideration that approximately ten to twelve millions of people visit the theaters every day, what a vast audience receiving instruction from the pictures is this? The moving picture is practically the newspaper of the boys and girls who will make the future generation and citizens of the States, and it is the exhibitor who is the greatest of all educationalists. All unknowingly he is giving instruction through the eye and the brain and bringing foreign countries, with the varied scenes found therein, before this vast school, and what is more honorable than the "Exhibitor Schoolmaster," who is endeavoring by every possible means in his power to make every little theater a village schoolhouse, a village playhouse, a theater of the poor?

MUSIC AS AN ASSET TO THE PICTURE THEATRE

EXHIBITORS as well as picture playing pianists and musicians will find much to interest them by closely following the "Picture Music" articles of our Mr. Ernst Luz. Nothing can add such a tone of refinement to the picture theater as pleasing and entertaining music, effectively and appropriately set. It has required much effort and persuasion on the part of Mr. Luz to influence the music publishers to co-operate with him along lines suggested in accordance with his views, which are highly commended in every mail. Mr. Luz is the only educational writer on "Picture Music" in the United States to-day; he writes exclusively for the News. Being a professional musician, he comes in daily contact with the many difficulties; his personal experiences are the basis of all his articles. For creating a higher standard for the picture theater his ideas are invaluable, and his article on another page is worthy of careful perusal.

Alfred H. Saunders.

Mr. T. J. Carrigan, familiarly known as Tom Carrigan by a wide circle of enthusiastic admirers, has returned to the Chicago studios of the Selig Polyscope Company and will shortly be seen in a series of pictures well adapted to his talents.

Montgomery and Stone and Miss Elsie Janis, with the members of the company presenting "The Lady of the Slipper," were guests of the Kinemacolor Company of America at the matinee exhibition of "The Making of the Panama Canal" and "Actual Scenes of the Balkan War" at the Carnegie Lyceum, New York, on February 4th.

THE CRIMSON CROSS

(Eclair Feature in Three Parts)

March 5th is the date on which the above mentioned three-part Eclair feature will be given its first public presentation. There is no doubt that "the Crimson Cross," which gives a very beautiful and lucid explanation of the significance of the "Rosary," will find great favor with moving picture theatregoers, as well as with a large majority of those who seldom, if ever, enter a theatre.

The first part of the picture is delightful in its atmosphere of puritanical simplicity and peacefulness. Julia Stuart as Martha Corey and Millie Bright as Priscilla Corey do much to preserve this charming quality of the picture.

One of the most effective scenes of the play is entitled "Evening." Here the Puritans are seen in solemn procession entering the church, their quaint figures standing out in bold relief against the quiet, hazy background of the twilight hour.

In this picture with the pretty love story of a Spanish sea captain and the beautiful Puritan maiden, Priscilla, there is interwoven with remarkable smoothness a series of tableaux depicting the symbolic meaning of the Holy Rosary. Attacked and imprisoned by the Puritans because of his demonstration of love for Priscilla, the captain is pictured in his rustic prison cell telling the mysteries of the Rosary to Priscilla, who, seeking to aid him to escape, has been intentionally locked in the prison by the keeper. The following is the order in which the visions are flashed before the wondering Puritan maiden:

1st. The Annunciation by the angel to the Virgin Mary.

2nd. The Visitation of Mary to Elizabeth.

3rd. The Nativity—Birth of the Saviour in the stable, surrounded by the adoring Magi and wondering animals.

SCENE FROM "THE CRIMSON CROSS"

4th. The Presentation of the Infant Jesus to Saint Simeon at the Temple.

5th. The Boy Jesus at the Temple confounding the priests by His wisdom, led forth by anxious parents.

1st. The Agony of Christ in the Garden of Gethsemane.

2nd. The Scourging of Christ in the courtyard of Pilate's palace. The soldiers urged on by the angry mob.

3rd. The Crowning of Jesus with Thorns, much to the joy of the howling populace.

4th. Jesus on the way to Calvary, carrying His Cross, followed by the jeering mob and a few faithful ones not daring to show their sorrow, save one, St. Veronica, who gives Him a cloth to wipe His face, and the miracle of the Agonized Face appearing on the cloth.

5th. The Crucifixion, where we depart from the usual view of Christ on the Cross and instead give the rending of the curtain in the temple, which, as it falls, discloses the old City of Jerusalem, and outside the walls on the fatal mount are seen the three crosses with their victims thereon. An astounded priest views the scene then turning to Heaven asks which is the true God. The sky darkens, lightning flashes and smoke issues here and there.

1st. Roman soldiers casting dice for the raiment of the Christ are surprised and horrified by noises; the raising of the lid of the tomb and Christ issuing forth and ascending into the air.

2nd. The Ascension. Mary and Christ's disciples repaired to the spot appointed by the Saviour. He suddenly appeared in their midst and with final instructions slowly ascended into heaven.

3rd. The Descent of the Holy Ghost upon Mary and the Eleven Apostles.

4th. The Assumption of the Blessed Virgin, slowly ascending to heaven accompanied by Angels.

5th. The Crowning of the Blessed Virgin, Queen of Angels and Saints in Heaven.

At the close of the story when the little maid Priscilla steals back to her father's house, and he in words of bitter denunciation bids her go, there is a most affecting scene where her mother, Martha Corey, opens the Bible and draws the attention of the angry father to the following passage:

"For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you."

"But if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses." Matthew 6: 14, 15.

Which he reads, and turning to Martha says: "You are right." He extends his arms and folds his daughter to his bosom.

POWER'S 6A AND VITAGRAPH PLAYERS AT PLEIADES CLUB

On Sunday evening, February 23rd, the Pleiades Club gave a dinner at the Hotel Brevoort in honor of the Vitagraph players.

The toastmaster, Commodore J. Stuart Blackton, demonstrated his ability as a speaker in a witty and felicitous address.

The pictures were all excellent and were projected by a Power's No. 6A with rock steadiness.

A large and enthusiastic audience appreciated the program which follows:

1. Overture, Mr. Alfred J. Doyle at the piano.
2. Mr. Ralph Ince in his wonderful portrayal of Abraham Lincoln presenting the one-act drama

MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' ASSOCIATION OF GREATER NEW YORK

A meeting of the exhibitors was held on the 18th day of February, at the Union Square Hotel, three hundred exhibitors being present. This special meeting was called for the purpose of providing ways and means of combatting unjust laws or rulings which have been enacted against moving picture theatres.

Mr. Rogers, our counsellor, made a very lengthy speech in connection with the ruling of the Special Sessions judges, to the effect that any member violating the standee law will probably receive a prison sentence. He quoted the law and advised all members not to violate this ordinance.

A motion was made and carried that the following members go to Albany and attend the hearing on the amendment to the Children's Law, which is to be heard before the Codes Committee at 2 p. m. Wednesday, the 19th inst.

The following are the representatives sent by the Exhibitors' Association of New York City; Mr. Samuel H. Trigger, Mr. Harold W. Rosenthal, Mr. Rudolph Sanders, Mr. William Hilkemeir, Mr. G. H. Bristol, Mr. William Brandt and Mr. A. A. Corn.

The following officers from their respective locals will also be in attendance at the hearings: Mr. George F. Wright, president, Albany local; Mr. L. C. Smith, second vice-president, Schenectady; Mr. E. O. Weinberg, first vice-president, Troy; Mr. J. C. Rosenthal, treasurer, Troy; Mr. J. E. Weidman, secretary, Albany, N. Y., in fact the Albany local will be represented in full force. Mr. William Douque, president of the Utica local, and Messrs. J. E. Reardon, secretary, and H. J. Lux, treasurer, of Utica. Mr. J. H. Morgan, president of the Syracuse local, and Mr. W. J. Lowery, treasurer, and E. M. Day, of Syracuse. Mr. A. N. Wolff, president of Rochester local, and W. G. McGreal, secretary. Mr. Harry Marsey, president of the Buffalo local, and Mr. Joseph Friedman, treasurer. Mr. H. L. Fox, president of the Binghamton local, and R. M. Davidson, secretary. Mr. M. D. Gibson, president of the Elmira local, and Mr. John C. Davis, of Saugerties, state treasurer.

In addition to these exhibitors above named there will also be present many heads of civic and religious organizations who are in favor of the passage of this bill, and also Mr. W. B. F. Rogers, counsel for the association, and Mr. Thomas Bannon, associate counsel.

The exhibitors have decided to hold a banquet in the very near future, and all the heads of the city departments and many well-known officials will be invited guests.

POWER'S INSTALLATION

A Power's Cameragraph No. 6A and extra mechanism have been installed by the Peoples Vaudeville Company in the Mt. Morris Theatre, Fifth avenue and 116th street, New York City, and a No. 6 in the Y. M. C. A., of Wooster, Mass., through Chas. E. Schneider & Co., of Springfield, Mass.

FEATURE FILM MEN ORGANIZE

The first regular meeting of the Feature Film Renters' Credit Association of Ohio was held in Cleveland, February 10, at the offices of the International Film Company, of which Mr. Siegel is manager, and was elected secretary and treasurer of the newly formed organization. Mr. Dupius, of the Central Film Company, of Lima, was elected president.

The exchanges in this association are:

The Central Feature Film Company, Lima; the U. S. Feature Film Company, Cleveland; United Feature Film Company, Toledo; Ohio Feature Film Company, Cleveland; Royal Feature Film Company, Columbus; Herman J. Garfield's Amusement Enterprises, Cleveland; International Feature Film Company, Cleveland, and Exclusive Feature Film Company, Cleveland.

Mr. Siegel writes us that they have made big progress at their first meeting. A committee has been appointed to call on the mayor in order to overcome difficulties in securing censorship for their films.

The object of this association is to protect the feature film men from bad accounts and to be represented in different parts of the state, so that one member can take care of another member's interests in different cities throughout the state.

FEATURE FILM SALES

The Prince Feature Film Company of Philadelphia has purchased the Gaumont state right feature "In the Claws of the Leopard" for Eastern Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland. Also for this territory this company has contracted for "The Race for the Millions," "The White Glove Band," "In the Grip of the Vampire" and "The Bridge of Sorrow."

The M. & F. Feature Film Company of Chicago have bought the rights for the State of Illinois on "In the Grip of the Vampire" and "The White Glove Band."

The Golden Gate Film Exchange are handling the Gaumont features in the States of California, Nevada and Arizona.

C. C. Chenoweth, of Kansas City, has purchased "In the Land of the Lions" for the States of Tennessee, Arkansas and Oklahoma.

S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Mfg. Company, is now sojourning up and down the California coast in search of scenics of an unusual and interesting kind.

On the present trip Mr. Hutchinson proposed to make a new scenic of San Francisco from an angle never before covered. He will also make a series of unique industrials in upper California. He has with him Mr. R. D. Armstrong, one of the American's best camera men and a former scenario editor, which assures not only the best of photography, but the natural abilities of a scenario editor in the selection of subjects.

Commencing with the first week in March Eclair's release days will be Sunday and Wednesday, instead of Sunday and Thursday as formerly. The Wednesday's release will henceforth be one of their splendid features.

OHIO STATE LEAGUE

Western Union Special to the Moving Picture News, Columbus, Ohio, February 25, 1913

At a meeting of the motion picture exhibitors of Ohio, held at the Neil House, Columbus, Ohio, prominent among those present were President Neff, of Cincinnati; National Secretary Christenson; Mr. Schwartz; Mr. Morris, of Cleveland; W. R. Wilson, of Columbus, and W. C. Settis, of Toledo. Mr. Neff read and explained the censor bill now before the Ohio legislature. After his explanation with one or two slight changes every exhibitor present was perfectly satisfied with the bill. If the bill is passed as drawn by President Neff it will be the means of saving the day for the exhibitors' film exchanges and manufacturers in the state of Ohio and other states as well. It will eliminate all municipal censor boards. A special feature of the bill which was heretofore misunderstood by many provides a national censor congress, legally constituted, which, if concurred in by two or three other states, will eliminate all other censor boards and the congress will censor the pictures for the entire United States without one extra cent of cost to the manufacturers, exhibitors or film exchanges of other states, provided the other states endorse the censor congress provided by the Ohio state censor bill.

J. A. MADDOX, Pres. Columbus Local No. 4.

COLUMBUS, OHIO, FEBRUARY 26, 1913

Western Union Special to the Moving Picture News

A conference of the members of the Exhibitors League of Ohio held here to-day in reference to proposed state censor bill now pending in the legislature. All parties endorsed the bill after a few changes were made. We think it is the best possible to accept at this time, owing to conditions arising in most of the municipalities in this state. The ultimate results of this bill will help manufacturers, film exchanges and exhibitors. Ohio exhibitors are now solid for the bill.

M. A. NEFF, National President,
C. M. CHRISTENSON, National Secretary.

New York Branch Motion Picture Exhibitors League

Samuel H. Trigger, president of the State League, with Harold W. Rosenthal, secretary, and W. B. F. Rogers, counselor, left New York on Tuesday, February 25th, to attend the banquet of the Buffalo exhibitors at which the Mayor and the leading officials of Buffalo were booked to be present at the Statler Hotel.

On Thursday, February 26th, a special meeting was arranged for the purpose of promoting the welfare of the Buffalo exhibitors, and to induce the whole of the exhibitors in Buffalo and vicinity to join the league. On the termination of the meeting Messrs. Trigger and Rosenthal will make a tour of the upstate locals, visiting Syracuse, Rochester, Binghamton, Utica and Elmira.

By an error in our last week's issue the names of Carl W. Storant, Rochester, and Messrs. P. Hofmeister and E. O. Weill, of Buffalo, were omitted from our list of representatives at the hearing which took place at Albany on the children's bill.

HORACE VINTON'S WORK

A recent cablegram from London announces the fact that W. B. Gray, president of the Comet Film Company, disposed of sixteen negatives of the Comet's most important releases immediately after showing them. Among the number "A Bachelor's Romance," "Two Women and One Man," "Reformed by Stratagem," "Reaping the Harvest," "Moonshiner's Task," "My Wife's Birthday," and others were written and produced by Horace Vinton.

Mr. Vinton's efforts in the past with the American, Shamrock and Comet companies have met with universal approval. In addition to a varied experience in the Cinematography industry, he has been prominently identified with dramatic work for many years past, both as actor and stage director, and only recently returned to New York after a special engagement of ten weeks.

AN INTERESTING FEATURE EXHIBIT FOR COMING EXPOSITION

, New York, February 25, 1913.

Editor, Moving Picture News,

My dear Mr. Saunders:

Desirous as I always am of keeping you posted of anything new that may transpire in reference to the coming exposition of the motion picture art, I beg to call your attention to the novelty display that will be made by the American Machine Company, manufacturers of the Standard machine.

Their Mr. Eric Morrison informs me that it is the company's intention to give a demonstrative exhibit in the manufacture of different parts of the Standard machine, and it is their intention to have four lathes in actual operation. One for cutting star wheels, one for grinding star wheels, one for cutting sprockets and one for grinding sprockets.

This exhibit no doubt will be very interesting to the general public who have never had an opportunity of seeing this work in actual progress.

They will also exhibit their 1913 model of the Standard machine, and are having the model of their 1914 machine made by hand and will be shown for the first time at the exposition.

Since my last letter to you a number of contracts have been closed for space and applications are coming daily to our offices in the German Bank Building, which is a very busy place at the present time.

The foreign mail is getting to be tremendous and applications are coming in daily for space, terms, etc.

With very best wishes, I remain,

Yours very truly,
F. E. SAMUELS, Secretary.

RUMORS OF LARGE SYNDICATE ENTERING THE MOVING PICTURE FIELD

One of the most pretentious moves for the advancement and elevation of the moving picture, so says Dame Rumor, is about to shape itself for action. It is whispered that two of the biggest theatrical interests in the country, namely, Klaw and Erlanger and the Shuberts, who have recently agreed to make mutual concessions in booking arrangements.

The question which has arisen since the above mentioned terms have been arrived at between these two large theatrical factions, of what will become of the theatres in the various cities when Klaw & Erlanger and the Shuberts have agreed on these mutual concessions, will find its answer in the anticipated plan of utilizing them for the exhibition of large moving picture productions. It is said that corporation papers with a list of directors have already been filed at Albany for an organization which will present in picture form the biggest dramatic hits of the past five or ten years, for most of which, it is said, the organizers have secured the moving picture rights.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

Protecting Ideas

A NEW YORK pictureplaywright and editor says he has decided to copyright his ideas. "I have been assailed by so many claimants and put to so much trouble that I propose to keep a diary of my ideas and copyright the good ones, if necessary," he writes. He doesn't claim that other people cannot think of the same ideas, but he believes that if he thinks out a new twist or angle on them first he will be able to prove that he thought them at a certain hour and put the legal stamp on them. What a blessing it was that no copyright law bothered the late W. Shakespeare when he turned on the idea tap and flooded the alembic of genius!

Now a Heavyweight

Giles R. Warren, Victor director, has breezed in from Havana, Cuba, carrying six added pounds of avoirdupois. He says he just loves the Isle of Sunshine, but the $25-per-day handout to the patriotic Cubans forbids permanent residence on the part of a mere director of moving picture plays.

Editorial Change

According to a notice we have received, Russell E. Smith, who has been in charge of the scenario department of The Magazine Maker, has left that magazine for an editorial desk elsewhere.

Biffs and Boosts

We inaugurate a new department. It is called "Biffs and "Boosts." Here are some recent "Biffs" and some recent "Boosts" which add to the editorial joy-of-living:

William Lord Wright is a LIAR when he says we have no "Photoplay Building."—The Photoplay Dramatist.

Thank you for securing me a better price for my scenario. You are a friend indeed.—Mrs. Arthur Moore, Tenn.

You know whereof you write, and editors and writers are grateful.—Giles R. Warren, Director Victor Co.

The critic you employ has little experience.—In letter from a publication, the editor threatening a libel suit.

More power to you.—L. S. McCloskey, editor Lubin Co.

I like your work.—C. B. Hoadley, Universal Film Co. editor.

And Wright knows.—W. A. Thomas, in Photoplay Magazine.

Before I started to read "Plots and Plays" I never sold a script. By following your advice week after week I have sold three.—Wm. Owens, Can.

He is doing a good work.—Epes Winthrop Sargent.

Too much importance is attributed to you and others of your ilk. Your attacks on schools only help our business. We have instructed our attorney to see if we cannot start action against you for libel.—Correspondence School.

We value your name highly and thank you for consenting to act as judge in our Mystery Play Contest.—E. V. Brewster, Motion Picture Story Magazine.

I have learned more about script writing since reading your department than in two years of individual endeavor. Following your suggestion, I first forgot what the course of lessons taught me. I sold both the scripts since reading your comments.—Brooklyn, N. Y.

You are a fool, a mutt, and I only read your stuff in order to laugh.—Anonymous.

You are without a peer.—Horace Vinton, former director American Shamrock, Comet.

We want to keep in touch with you.—Lu Senarens, editor Moving Picture Stories.

I read the World and Photoplay Magazine script departments with disgust and turned to you hoping for relief. Your stuff is worse than the other two put together. I always tear out the pages of such rot from my trade papers.—Louisville, Ky., Corres., name indescipherable.

Not the least portion of the value of your work to writers is the habit of yours to write instructive and authoritative letters to correspondents. I have greatly benefited therefrom.—Miss Jennie Franklin, Kansas.

Our readers value your articles on scenario writing.—Editor Letenure, the Photoplay Author.

Marc Edmund Jones' Experience

Marc Edmund Jones, Chicago picture playwright, says to us:

> I note that you endorse the "get together" groups of picture playwrights and so I drop you a line of appreciation, and will say that all of us in the little Chicago group have benefited from our meetings, and that we will be glad to welcome to our membership any writer in Chicago who has one or more sales to his credit. We meet every other week; exchange comments, and view some of the current releases. I read your comments each week and enjoy them. I smiled at your unusual experiences. I have received a check in nine days from the same concern that has kept me waiting nearly five months. And the script that was snapped up in nine days, over a month ago, is being held and will not be produced until next summer, while I sent the assignment of copyright on a script to-day, the production of which was finished yesterday. It was produced before they could get the check to me and receive the blanks back. Verily, the ways of manufacturers are strange! Keep up the good work.

Sure, the ways of some passeth understanding, but at the same time, every editorial department has its own system of doing business, and so long as the check arrives in good time all is well. We suggest to Mr. Jones that the "get together" group take the name "Knights of the Round Table." You will remember that in English mythology, good King Arthur presided over a round table where at certain times Sir Knights and the ladies gathered and experiences aimed at many a "joust" and "bickering" were rehearsed. You folks gather round the table and rehearse your "jousts" with the festive script and your "bickerings" with the various editors. We want to see the writers in other cities follow the example of the Chicago group. Great benefit can be obtained from mutual experience meetings and good fellowship can be fostered. Give a social atmosphere to the meetings, serve light refreshments, and have members prepare and read papers on various subjects connected with the profession. We hope Mr. Jones will write to us more at length concerning the Chicago idea, for others are interested in the plan.

Another Proposition

We received another "scholastic" proposition the other day. A man we never heard of writes that he has a "course" in moving picture writing about ready for the press and he wishes to instruct his students to read some of the trade publications which "print moving picture items." Our correspondent would like to recommend the Moving Picture News and will do so in his "course" providing he receives a letter from us. If his "course" contained any merit he would recommend all trade publications and magazines without any letters, which would probably be used for advertising purposes. He will re-receive no letter from us.

"Up in the Air"

"Up in the air, tra, la, up in the air!" seemeth to be the ditty now being sung by Will T. Henderson, 3505 Michigan Boulevard, 'phone Douglas 7570, Chicago. We give his complete address so that Marc Edmund Jones can talk with him anent "The Knights of the Round Table." Mr. Henderson is in a quandary as his following letter will prove:

> First of all, I am a would-be, would-like-to-be and wish-the-Lord-I-knew-enough-to-be a successful pictureplay story writer. But, I declare, I don't know what to think—they've got me "up in the air." Who? Why, the so-called "schools," the publications on the subject by certain associations, also those by private individuals, scenario editors of magazines, scenario editors of motion picture companies, and, lastly, Miss Virginia West, in her "model scenario" published in the News—they've got me on the run. One says one thing about the proper preparation of details, another says exactly to the contrary. Now, the "last straw" that "sent me glimmering" was or is (to me) the astounding fact that her story entitled "The Old Flag Restored," is an exact duplicate in every detail, in form not in plot, of the style in which I prepare my first "mighty effort" in pictureplay story writing. Yet I was told by certain know-it-alls that my synopsis was too long and the scenario too verbose—dealt too minutely in detailed explanation of the action required; in brief the entire production was bad, but that the story was good. One says: "Cut down the number of your scenes to fifteen or twenty, fifteen if possible." Another says: "Use as many scenes as a clear, lucid picturing of your story requires—forty if necessary." At motion picture theatres I have witnessed picture-plays containing forty-six scenes, including sub-titles; thirty-six, not counting sub-titles. They often contain thirty to thirty-five scenes. One of my scripts contained twenty-six scenes, some of them exceedingly short; the twenty-six scenes included the sub-titles being counted as separate scenes; that left, not counting sub-titles as scenes, about nineteen scenes, yet I was told I had too many scenes, to cut it down about ten scenes; that would have left about nine scenes, not counting the sub-title. "When doctors (supposedly constituted authority) disagree, who shall decide?" I cut the synopsis of one story down to about half the original length, and what do you suppose I got for that? "Synopsis too short." Can you beat it? In another, I cut down the length of the scenario by eliminating all really unnecessary words. Well, what do you think they slipped me for that? "Description of action too brief in explanatory details." Now, frankly, I believe Virginia West's style of preparation is the correct and most sensible one; however, I will admit I don't know.

In reply to Mr. Henderson we will state frankly that we are against the publication of "sample scenarios." Scripts that have been produced are sometimes convincing to the tyro when put in type, but most of them only tend to confuse the beginner. Experienced script writers do not carefully follow the "chalk-line and spirit-level layout." Most of the star writers have favorite markets and know the desires, and demands, and peculiarities of the certain editors and directors. They know whether the director they are supplying works strictly from synopsis, or likes elaborate and detailed business. Giles R. Warren is a director who works from a clean-cut, comprehensive synopsis. Others like both synopsis and action. We can only say that experience is the best teacher on the methods of preparing scripts for the various markets. Almost every editor and director has likes and dislikes which are absorbed in time by the advanced scribe. We repeat the statement so often made in this department, that when writing for the general market and not specializing, a synopsis of not exceeding 300 words, a cast, scene plat and scenic action should be used. An average script, single spaced, should not cover more than three or three and a half pages of 8½ x 11 MSS. We do it in that and you can, too. Leave the "36, 46 and 56" scenes to the director. Some directors have a habit of cutting scripts into "kaleidoscopic hops," but the average writer should stick to the number of scenes really necessary to properly develop and clearly put over the action. Use as few sub-titles as possible. We saw a picture last night with eighteen and the yarn with a little care could have been put over with two. Art is just as essential in writing sub-titles or leaders as art is essential in writing the synopsis. Both should be as brief, as comprehensive, and as clear-cut as possible. Both should tell a story. We read a script the other day, written by a versatile author, too. He has too many irons in the fire and his work is showing it. One leader read: "Home!" One word. An all-comprehensive word and an appealing sub-title.

When Mr Henderson cut down the synopsis of one story to half its original length, perhaps he cut out half the story the synopsis should have told the editor. When we advise writers to brief up their synopsis we do not mean to convey the impression that just a few lines of explanatory matter is all that is necessary. The synopsis while brief, should be comprehensive; it should seek to tell all the salient points in the story; tell them clearly and briefly; tell them straight from the shoulder without any word pictures or paintings.

"Mr. John A. Jones, a well-known and prosperous farmer, residing at Squedunk, while out walking at an early hour yesterday morning, slipped on the ice, which covered the sidewalk near his home, and, in the fall that he sustained, his left leg was broken Members of his family rushed to his rescue and he was carried into the house and Dr. Killem was called and cared for the injured man"

Here is a little story and it takes over seventy words to tell it. And here is just as comprehensive an account of John's misfortune:

"John A. Jones, Squedunk farmer, struck the icy sidewalk yesterday breaking his left leg."

Fourteen words to relate the same story. In the fourteen words we tell who fell, when, the occupation of the unfortunate, his place of residence, the extent of injury. It is reasonable to suppose that he was carried home and that a surgeon was called and reduced the fracture. Some writers seemingly believe that script readers are not endowed with sufficient brains to catch such logical results. Do not follow strictly the outlines of "sample scenarios" whether they be correct or incorrect. Be individual, put common sense into your work, be clear, but as terse as possible; study the picture screen, not as a source of entertainment, but for beneficial knowledge; read the stories of releases and keep your synopsis within 300 words. You can tell a whole lot in 300 words. With the many "schools" "professors" and house-organs seeking to instruct the script writer these days, there is little wonder that our friend, Mr. Henderson, clambered aboard an airship. Come down, Henderson, and attend to business.

Complaints Received

We have received complaints that money sent the editor of a monthly publication, printed at Cleveland for the ostensible instruction of script writers, is not returned when the money fails to arrive on "three months' trial offer." We have advised complainants to tell "Uncle Sam" all about it.

Pertinent Pointers

The play's the thing—and so is the title thereof.
There is always room for another good writer.
Develop your action but do not permit your plot to suffer.
First be sure you have a story to tell, then go ahead.
Avoid "fine writing," cultivate a clear style and weigh your adjectives.
Better write one good script every four weeks than four bad scripts.
Exhibitors are demanding a better class of pictures. Are you prepared to cater to this demand?
Comedy is hardest to write. The script that reads funny will frequently be mournful if filmed. A correspondent writes in that he is good on "ridiculous" plots. There are others.
Take your wares to the proper market. Selig might buy the story of the fierce tiger, but Imp couldn't use it.
Do not try to sell from synopsis. Send in a developed script unless otherwise ordered.
Never waste an idea. Keep every "bunch" you get and file them away. Some day they may prove golden.
If directors are well paid to visualize what authors write, authors should be well paid for furnishing the material.
"Tell them to study and keep on studying the picture screen," was the best advice a famous director could write in to us recently.
A good start is like coasting down hill to a trained script writer, for it suggests the entire story.
When the beginner conceives a strong climax he should remember that it is just the big ending of his story. Preliminary action should be made consistent and logical or else the climax may prove wortbless.

Picture Playwrights' Dinner

On Saturday, March 1, a picture playwrights' dinner will be served at the Taverne Louis. E. W. Sargent originated the feast and is the host. Marc Edmund Jones will represent the Chicago group of scribes, and Van Buren Powell is expected to lead in the members of "The Optimistic Order." Such social gatherings promote fraternalism and are worthy in every respect.

LOIS WEBER AND PHILLIPS SMALLEY

These two artists are well known to the whole profession and to thousands of theatregoers. They are with the Rex Company, with whom they have been for several months past, and at the present time they are being featured by the Universal Film Company of this city.

Lois Weber still writes her own stories, and with Phillips Smalley assisting her are playing the leads and directing the work as of olden times. Some of their recent releases are "The Two Thieves," "In the Blood," "Troubled Waters" and the "Empty Box."

Phillips Smalley is getting some wonderful light effects, and the Rex is, as it always has been, the King of the Universal program.

GEORGE KLEINE'S RELEASES

"Nipped in the Bud" is the title of the Tuesday Cines. It describes the adventures of a young man who is sent to the city to study law, but soon neglects his work, because friends persuade him that he has great talent for the stage. On the same reel is a bright little comedy entitled "Wanted—A Husband." It tells of two old beaux who answer a wealthy widow's advertisement for a husband, and is very funny. For the Wednesday Eclipse "The Wages of Transgression" is a subject of considerable more than average dramatic merit. It tells of the attempts of a man who under the disguise of friendship attempts to bring dishonor to his friend's home by making unwelcome advances toward his wife, and the consequences, which are worked out in an interesting and highly dramatic manner.

"The Ideal of Her Dreams" is the Saturday Cines release. It deals with the experiences of a charming and somewhat romantic young girl who falls in love with a photograph of a handsome army officer. Day and night she dreams of her ideal and her infatuation soon leads to a complete estrangement from her sweetheart who has been her true friend for years. But her disillusionment is not long in coming. An old friend of the family, seeing the picture, claims to know the gentleman and offers to introduce her. She finds the "ideal of her dreams" to be an old gray-haired man who acknowledges that the picture is authentic, but was taken forty years ago.

The above illustration represents our friend Williamson Buckman, of Trenton, N. J. He is the most traveled amateur Cinematographer the world knows. He is an enthusiast of the work, and when abroad last year, his camera recorded events it is impossible for a professional to get. Cinematography is a "hobby" with him, and he is never so happy as when he has his beloved cameras near him and reading the Moving Picture News.

"HIAWATHA," THE INDIAN PASSION PLAY IN PICTURES

An event most interesting to critics and other thinking individuals occurred on Tuesday evening, February 25th in the Berkeley Theatre, New York, when Frank E. Moore exhibited to a large number of invited guests, including press representatives from the leading newspapers of the city, a four-reel motion picture production of Longfellow's poem, "Hiawatha."

"Hiawatha" as an outdoor play has been presented most successfully by Mr. Moore during the past few years with a cast of Indian players at various parks and private estates. These same Indians, some 150 strong, have participated in the most remarkable manner in the production of the picture play which is being handled by Mr. Moore from his office at Room 1212, Times Building, New York, as a states right proposition.

At the above mentioned presentation in the Berkeley

SCENE FROM "HIAWATHA"

Theatre Robert Stuart Pigott recited the lines of the poem as the picture play was being enacted upon the screen. An overture of Ojibway music rendered by a capable orchestra preceded the opening of the picture, which consumed from an hour and three-quarters to two hours in its projection.

The picture production of "Hiawatha" as presented by Mr. Moore is delightful. The true atmosphere of the poem has been secured, and is maintained throughout. It is intensely interesting to note the work of these full-blooded Pagan Indians. There is a dignity, a strong dramatic instinct and a natural grace about the American Indian that cannot be denied and which asserts itself most strongly in this film production of "Hiawatha." Natural and free from affectation as children, they participate in the action of the play in a manner that is most delightful. The graceful poses and the deliberate action of the erect figure of the youth who played the role of Hiawatha was a revelation of dignified and vigorous manhood; and the simple coyness of manner and the mirthful smile of Minnehaha were delightfully interpretative of "Laughing Water." The mischief-loving Paw-Puk-Keewis must not be forgotten in our criticism, for he with his naughty fun elicited a laugh every time he moved. Nor could anything surpass the pathos of the latter part of the play as interpreted by these Indians, some of whom come from across the border from the Grand River reservation near Brantford, Ont., some from Dakota and some from New York State. The destitution and misery of the famine scene, the death of Minnehaha with the Spirit of Famine and the Spirit of Fever attendant on her death, the subdued anguish of Hiawatha, the burial of Minnehaha, all have been so effectively worked out that the more susceptible members of the audience assembled on Tuesday evening were moved to tears.

And finally comes the arrival on the scene of the pale-faced stranger, Black Robe, in whose favor Hiawatha abandons his wigwam, and embarks in his canoe for the land of the sunset, charging his people to cherish the stranger and to listen to his words. This scene is very beautifully depicted, and in fact the entire production carries with it a solemn charm of peculiar fascination. To use Mr. Moore's words, "Nature's own studio was used for the settings, with the blue sky for a canopy, and the 'forest deep and darksome' for the 'props.'" Portions of the picture were taken in New York State, some on Lake Superior, and in other parts of the country which served to supply appropriate and authentic settings.

KINEMACOLOR

The "Animated Map," which shows in moving pictures the history of Turkish conquest of Europe for five centuries in as many minutes and has been such a dramatic as well as educational adjunct to the Kinemacolor Balkan War scenes at the Carnegie Lyceum, is to be supplemented by an equally interesting and instructive map of the working Panama Canal. This shows a broad view of the Western continent,—from the standpoint of an observer on the planet Mars, for instance,—with the great artificial waterway which has separated North and South America slightly enlarged for pictorial purposes. On this map are traced the great ocean lanes of traffic between the principal ports of the world, illustrating how the Panama Canal will curtail both the time and expense of travel between them.

Right here is where the "Moving" part of the picture comes in to "point the moral and adorn the tale"; for instead of measuring off these relative distances in dry figures and statistics the spectator is shown two ships starting simultaneously from New York for San Francisco. The one that goes by the Canal route is docked and unloaded before the other, following the old ocean course, has fairly rounded Cape Horn. Likewise, ships from New York to Yokohama, or even to Valparaiso on the west coast of South America, arrive much quicker by the Canal than by the all-ocean route.

This map was made in England, after careful measurements of actual distances according to the British hydrographic charts and comparison of relative speeds of steamships according to the drift of currents and the prevalence of head winds. The special interest which the English take in our Canal is illustrated by the ships sailing from London for Pacific and Oriental ports,—those going via Panama always arriving far ahead of seagoing rivals.

Especially interesting to children and others who never saw the working of a canal is the profile view of the great Gatun dam, showing how a steamship is taken through the locks,—being lifted from one water level to another by the four greatest hydraulic elevators in the world. Taken in connection with the natural color views of the making of the Panama Canal, this "Sailing Map" is as instructive and entertaining as an actual trip to the Isthmus,—where the Kinemacolor spectator witnesses many moving scenes which will never be visible again after the water is turned on. The new map will be on view at the Carnegie Lyceum every afternoon and evening beginning with next Monday's matinee.

The Associated Press, which serves almost every newspaper of any worth in this broad land of ours, recently carried this story:

> Thomas J. Ahearn, New York State fire marshal, discussed "Moving Picture Shows and Arson" in his annual report to the Legislature. It has been shown, he says, "that moving picture shows have frequently been the occasion of pyromania." He cites instances where persons peculiarly susceptible to suggestions have left these shows to set fires. The remedy he sets is a rigid censorship of films. The report declares that 15,000,000 persons throughout the country daily attend moving picture exhibitions, and are "exposed to danger from fires and unbridled displays."

The above item was printed by two out of every three newspapers in the United States. The Associated Press, recently, has been carrying long and detailed accounts of picture show fire alarms and other items directly or indirectly detrimental to the moving picture industry. The Associated Press is supposed to be unbiased. The Association recently served up a "box lead" on "Movie Panic Deaths." Its figures follow: "Bolgviek, Russia, 1911, 90; Canonsburg, Pa., 1912, 25; New York, 1913, 2." Why this supposedly independent news carrying agency should pay so particular attention to matters detrimental to Cinematography right at present is unknown. To our mind it is significant. Intemperate remarks concerning the moving picture theatre and moving picture productions are continually "played up," and whether the policies of those newspapers taking the service are friendly or unfriendly to Cinematography, the news is often printed as it stands.

* * * *

The coupling of arson with moving picture shows by the New York State fire marshal is a deliberate injustice. Maybe the Tammany saloonkeepers, enraged because the moving picture shows are taking money from the grog shops, are satisfied with such ignorant reports. Why doesn't this state fire marshal relate the fact in his report that ninety per cent of the cases of incendiarism is attributable to the saloon? The insane asylums, penitentiaries and city prisons are daily object lessons of the licensed saloon. But the New York official ignores this great curse and real cause of all crime, and centers his attacks on a form of innocent amusement. "Persons peculiarly susceptible to suggestions have left these shows to set fire," because they have primarily visited a saloon and their weak brains were first fired with liquor. Advocate a strict censorship of the grog shop and leave the greatest enemy of the grogshop, and all of its attendant evils, to continue a beneficent work.

* * * *

The men who control the destinies of the moving picture industry are proud of their progress. They have due reason so to be. However, there is invariably the minority which lags behind in the march of progress. The thing to do is to give such officials as the New York State fire marshal, not the slightest ground to stand upon. This department was the first to protest against the filming of dime novels and overly sensational melodrama. Our arguments seemingly had the desired effect, and there are few enlightened manufacturers in 1913 who will not now admit the soundness of our arguments of 1912. Environment sometimes cuts an important figure in the world's work. The man who lives continually in New York City often cannot clearly perceive the trend of sentiment which constantly shifts and changes in the wide stretch of country west of the metropolis. He may learn of the desires of the exhibitors and the pictureplay fans through emissaries, and, at the same time, these agents may not always be aware of the hidden currents of opinion which are originating and then growing, until suddenly they become tidal waves. Our method is, while visiting various states and cities west of Gotham, to drop into the theatres, overhear the opinions expressed by audiences while leaving the theatres and to have heart to heart talks with the exhibitors. These men will frankly express their opinions to us when some of them would not talk so freely to representatives of exchanges or of manufacturers.

Just a few of the manufacturers are too entirely self-complacent. They sneer at the "palmy days" of the moving picture stage and proceed to show how much finer in all artistic ways the present methods are; the greater talent and skill of the actors; how much better literature the plays; how infinitely superior the careful settings of the present to the haphazard old-fashioned ways that prevailed but a few years ago. In many respects there is ground for this cock-suredness. Methods have improved; settings are superior; attention to detail is more evident; and the skill of the actors and actresses convincing but—

How much better literature the plays?

No production can be superior to the story which is the foundation and the bare building. All the rest is ornamentation. Certain manufacturers in every group have lately devoted more attention to the stories. Editors and directors have finally discovered that the story is not the least part of the production. There are some powers, however, who seemingly will never display judgment. Instead of following in the footsteps of the far-seeing manufacturers and filming the best in literature, the height of their literary ambition and knowledge appears to be the securing of some ex-detective to write of his experiences, or the author of sawmill melodrama to revamp his farce plays for the picture screen. Filmland does not need nor does it desire the alleged romantic adventures of "high-class criminals," nor the rehearsing of sensational melodramas. The judgment that promotes such "enterprises" is not good judgment, and is bound to accomplish harm to those who are seeking to film dignified, refined and educational picture plays. It is just such enterprise that gives notoriety seekers their advantage. If such stories are to be released all over the country with the dawn of the new year, then the arguments of the reformers (God save the mark) for more rigid censorship are well taken. The dime novel, which many state legislatures throughout the Middle West placed under the ban a few years ago, should not be revived through Cinematography. No opportunity should be given reformers to assert that the small boy is taught the glamour of crime and criminal hero worship through the mediumship of the moving picture theatre. Cinematography is bound to be judged by the company it keeps.

* * * *

Selfish manufacturers may be inclined to state, upon reading this, that we are waging an unmerited attack upon their business, and that our assertions are far-fetched. We shall be happy to answer all such arguments, and pleased to thresh out the question at any time. We are speaking for the uplift of the moving picture industry when we decry the silly exploitation of the criminal and the crook. Let us quote from a widely-heralded statement contained in the recent issue of a house-organ:

> "The type of criminal to be introduced to the public will be an entirely new one. The real wrongdoers, those whom the police fear the most, are the ones who seldom resort to extreme violence. They exercise their crafts in a highly intelligent and scientific manner, leaving behind little or no trace of their identity or a clue by which they may be trailed. Detective stories outrivaling the mythological feats of Sherlock Holmes and centered about the world's most famous and desperate criminals, soon will be produced in motion pictures."

The announcement goes on to state that pitched battles, hand-to-hand encounters and smoking revolvers will be eliminated, and that "it is the goodness which he has discovered in many inhabitants of the underworld, who are rated as the world's most desperate characters that will be brought to the surface and illustrated in pictures. The sacrifice many of them make in fulfilment of the timeworn adage: 'There is honor even among thieves.'"

* * * *

There may or there may not be honor among thieves—we do not associate with them, and hence do not know. Neither do we believe that careful fathers and mothers desire that their boys and girls become familiar in the picture theatre with "the world's most famous and desperate criminals."

Why is it necessary to delve into the environment of desperate criminals and flaunt the "underworld," so called, in the faces of respectable women and their children, when there is so much not criminally suggestive that will edify and entertain.

There is not a wise father in this country who would wish his fifteen-year-old boy to read "Raffles," the story of a polished and gentlemanly safe-blower. And there is not a father or mother who will not protest against the utilization of the moving picture to paint in subtlely attractive tints "a new type of criminal."

Do you wish YOUR boy to become familiarized with desperate criminals who exercise their crafts in a highly intelligent and scientific manner?

* * * *

And in direct contrast with the ill-judgment which prompted the announcement of "the high-type-of-criminal-film," comes the excellent judgment of this same combination in releasing "Snow-White," a three-reel adaptation of Grimm's fairy tales. Here is something entertaining, refined and educating. Grimm's fairy tales are classic. "Snow-White" is one of his best legends. It will surely please both young and old. We recall to our mind's eye a certain curly-headed little tot who demanded "Snow-White" as a "bedtime story." And we can yet see his eyes grow round as the Queen consults her mirror and is told:

"O Queen, you are of beauty rare!
But Snow-White living in the glen,
With the seven little men,
Is ten times more fair"

MOVING PICTURES AND THE PANAMA-PACIFIC EXPOSITION

The moving picture has already become an important feature of the Panama-Pacific Exposition to be held in San Francisco in 1915.

With the arrival of every foreign potentate or delegation to choose a site for a national exhibit in the exposition, the moving picture man is kept busy. Pictures are taken of every passing event connected with the preparations for America's greatest international exposition.

The site on which the exposition buildings are to be erected affords excellent opportunity to the camera man gifted with the sense of the picturesque. There is almost a daily round of events on the exposition site and its vicinity—events which are followed closely by the moving picture artists—surrounding the selection and dedication of state building sites. These events are attended usually by military displays of more than ordinary splendor.

Thousands of people follow these functions regularly and the brilliant scenes, which have the advantage of the all-year-round California sunshine and the background of ocean and hills, present living pictures of unique interest.

The pictures are frequently exhibited in San Francisco the same night following the exposition event, and later the films are shown not only throughout the State of California, but all over the country and Europe.

With every day's event a progressive step is taken in preparing for the exposition. Already thirty-three states and territories of the American flag have selected and dedicated their sites for buildings on the exposition grounds. In addition to the home commonwealths, twenty-six foreign nations have accepted the invitations which were sent to the world less than a year ago by the President of the United States. With every meeting of Parliament, Legislature, House of Assembly, Chamber of Deputies, Reichstag or Convocation, the representative governments of nations all over the world are taking steps for the national participation in the 1915 World's Fair.

With such activity abroad it is only natural that in San Francisco there are continuous scenes and events of lively interest.

The city of San Francisco is preparing itself and donning the garb of festival which it will wear in 1915. Stately buildings are being erected. The water front, piers, locks, wharves, and harbors are being extended and renovated so that every facility will be ready for the landing of merchandise and people in the city that will be host to the world in 1915.

All these varied activities mean copy to the moving picture man. For San Francisco is famous the world over as a city of festival and when it has the opportunity it lets go with a vim, transforming a function into an institution.

As preparations for the great exposition increase in magnitude, so the opportunity for the moving picture man in San Francisco becomes more lively. When the exposition opens on February 20, 1915, pageant after pageant will be held in the great courts, the architectural beauty of which surpasses anything that has ever been conceived for similar purposes.

Official pictures of every event before and during the exposition are being and will be taken to be kept as a permanent and accurate record of the world's greatest International Exposition which is being held in 1915 to celebrate the opening of the Panama Canal.

NOW I LAY ME DOWN TO SLEEP

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Imp Release)

I SAT in my garden one evening, gazing up at the full moon. "What a lot of stories you might tell, old moon, if you only could," I said half aloud.

"Perhaps I can," said a voice, distinct but seeming to come from nowhere in particular.

After the first surprise at hearing the voice I seemed to take it as a matter of course.

"Then tell me a story, please," I requested.

"Very well, let me see."

There was silence for several minutes, but for the night insects among my flowers.

"Our first scene is this," began the moon, "two little children are ready for bed. The young mother busies herself about the room, making everything ready for the night. She stands a moment watching the boy and girl tumbling playfully upon the floor, tears of joy springing to her eyes.

"'Come, children, it's getting late,' is the gentle command.

"Instantly they are upon their feet.

"'Oh, Mother,' pleads the girl, 'let us say our prayers in the moonlight. I think God could hear us better if the light wasn't so bright.'

"The mother smiles. 'Perhaps He could, dear. We'll use His own light.'

"She turns out the light and sits near the window where my rays fall in a silver beam. Trustingly the children kneel at the mother's knee. They bow their heads and remain silent, awaiting her word.

"She places a hand upon each white-robed form. 'Now,' she says softly.

"The children's prayer begins, low but very clear:

"'Now I lay me down to sleep;
I pray the Lord my soul to keep.
If I should die before I wake
I pray the Lord my soul to take.

"'Mother,' says the boy seriously when the prayer is ended, 'Mother, God won't think we want Him to take our souls to-night, will He?

"'No, dear, He understands that you want Him to take them into His care if they should go far away from you and not come back. But my little boy is not afraid to die, is he?' she adds.

"'No,' he answers, stoutly, 'but I don't think I want to leave you yet.'

"'I want to stay with you, too, Mother, dear,' cries the girl, throwing her arms around her mother's neck.

"'My precious ones! You shall stay, I am sure. Now come along. It is time all little folks were in bed.'

"The children snuggle into bed; the mother kisses them, and crosses the room through the moonlight where it falls upon the floor.

"Fifteen years have passed. Again we look into that room where we heard the children say their prayers at their mother's knee.

"But the scene is very different now. The mother lies upon the bed, very weak and pale. The two children stand one on each side of the bed, each holding close a hand of the mother.

"The children have grown tall. The girl is fresh and beautiful, with soft, frank eyes that do not waver. Over her forehead the hair lies in soft waves. The mouth is sweet and tender.

"The boy, too, is good to look upon. He is tall and straight and strong of body. The eyes and the mouth are almost as beautiful as the sister's, but there is in them a lack of the strength which hers possess.

"Perhaps the mother knows this, for as she speaks her eyes are turned most anxiously to the young boy.

"'My children, my little ones,' she murmurs, 'you are only my little ones grown tall—you know that I must leave you. I would stay for your sakes if I could. Be brave and steadfast. Keep in the straight and narrow path. You will know it without seeking. Do not—argue—with yourselves—about the—right. Only follow—what you feel. Then—then—you will be—safe. My babies!'

"The mother closes her eyes and in a moment her spirit has flown.

"'Mother!' breaks from the lips of the children as they sink to their knees.

"Then I hid my face behind a cloud and did not look again. Poor children!

"You see," continued the old moon, "I took an interest in those young people, so, of course, I looked in on them whenever I could get around to it. I'll not take the time to tell you all for I must be on my way. I'll hasten to the end of my story.

"The brother and sister lived together quietly for a while. Then I began to see another man in the house sometimes—that is, when I looked in in the earlier part of the evening. I didn't see the boy so often, and when I did he looked pale and haggard and seemed restless.

"Then one night I thought I had lost them. I peeped in through the sitting-room window early in the evening and found the place empty. As quick as I could manage I made my way around to another side of the house and looked in through another window. But all was bare. They had gone.

"I did not know where to look for them, and besides I had my duties to perform, so there was nothing for me but to go steadily on my way.

"Well, one night I happened to see that an old building had been torn down and a much lower one left exposed. I was sure I had never looked into this before, and knowing that I should send my rays into the humblest quarters as well as the richest I managed to peep through a crack. Oh, if I could I would have wept! There at a table with some rough-looking men sat the young man. His eyes were wide and wild; his usually pale face was flushed from drinking; before him lay a pile of bills and silver. I went on my way with much sadness that night.

"Shortly after that I came from behind a cloud one night about ten o'clock. I looked straight into a bedroom of a new house which I had been taking little notice of because it was empty. This night I do notice, for there stands my young woman beside a man whose arm is around her waist. They are looking down upon a sleeping child. Oh, but I am happy then. I linger as long as I can before going on my way that night."

The moon hesitated for a moment or two.

"Well?" I said, anxious to hear the rest of the story.

"Well," continued the moon, "the next time I saw the young man was earlier in the evening. I peeped through the crack in the wall of the old house and found him with several evil-looking men. They were in the middle of a conversation. They were trying to persuade the young man to something and he was making protests which became weaker and weaker.

"'The man's gone away and the woman's all alone with the kid,' said one.

"'Yes, an' you can get away with the goods easy,' said another.

"'But I don't want to steal,' protested their victim.

"'You're afraid.'

"'Yes, that's it, fellows, he's afraid,' some of the others said to him. And then he gave way. I thought of the mother I had watched so long before, and of the dying advice she had given about never arguing about the right. Well, well."

It seemed to me the moonlight on my garden wavered a bit.

"I wanted to be cheered up after that," continued the moon, "so as soon as I could I looked in at the sister. She was undressing her little girl in the room where I had first seen her since her marriage. A shaded lamp threw a soft light around the room so that I was not noticed at all.

"As I was situated at that time I could see into two rooms at once. Heavy curtains hung between them.

"Suddenly I see a man steal into the vacant room on tiptoe. At first I think it is the husband come to peep in at the pretty picture of mother and child. But no, he is moving too stealthily.

"In the other room the little girl is ready for bed and kneels at her mother's knee for her nightly prayer.

"At the first sound of her voice the man stops. Then slowly his head drops and he creeps closer to the curtain. It seems that all else is forgotten in the sound of the baby's prayer. He does not know that his hand is touching the curtain, even pushing aside the opening. He has forgotten all.

"Something glistens in his hand, then it clatters to the floor. The woman hears, and sees that it is a thief with table silver dropping from his hand. She reaches quickly to a drawer and in an instant has fired a shot through the curtain.

"The man falls forward almost at her feet. With a cry she sets the child aside and raises his head in her arms. 'My brother,' she says, 'my lost brother; oh, I have killed you!'

"'Do not grieve, sister,' he says. 'It was the prayer that took me back so long ago. Let—let the baby—say it—again.'

"The frightened child is soon calmed and she kneels beside her mother and lisps her baby prayer:

"'Now I lay me down to sleep;
I pray the Lord my soul to keep.
If I should die before I wake
I pray the Lord my soul to take.'

"'Lord—my soul—to—take,' murmurs the man and he sinks back upon the floor."

"And?" I said softly, after the moon had been silent for a time.

"That is all. I had to go then, and I must go now, too. I'll see you again. Good night."

GAUMONT STATES RIGHT FEATURE SUPERBLY BEAUTIFUL

It would be difficult to overestimate the merits of the Gaumont States Right feature about to be placed on the market, and which is entitled "The Union Eternal." The beauty with which this production has been staged is hard to realize without having witnessed it. Interior and exterior settings have been so carefully and artistically taken care of that the result, especially at the climax of the film, is a rare feast of delight. The delicate poetic touches given the staging of the story in stage direction, photography (which latter is superb) and the natural and effective work of the playing artists are truly marvelous. The closing scene where Mera after hearing of the death of her lover goes in the night down to the rocks on the stormy sea beach and throws the flowers given her on the occasion of her singing the title role in Gounod's opera "Sappho" into the water is something that clings to the memory long after the crank of the projecting machine has ceased its hum. As she stands on the rocks, her gauzy garments floating on the night wind, the spray of the breaking waves splurging their anger far above her head, the picture reaches a point where even hard-shelled critics exclaim in admiration. The last word of the silent story shows a bare waste of waters with the lyre, upon which had been twined the flowers which were flung in the sea, floating on the waves, a few remaining flowers still clinging to it.

SCENE FROM "THE UNION ETERNAL"

SCENE FROM "THE UNION ETERNAL"

Three reels of film are utilized in the telling of this beautiful and touching story.

HAMILTON THEATRE, YONKERS, N. Y., OPENS

Mr. A. E. Hamilton, of Yonkers, operating the Palace Theatre there, opens his new Hamilton Theatre this week. It will be devoted to high-class motion pictures and vaudeville acts. Through J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," were installed two Powers No. 6A M. P. machines, motor driven, with Hallberg A. C. to D. C. Economizers of 60 amp. capacity; also a full line of theatre equipment and stage lighting apparatus. Mr. Hamilton had previously installed the Hallberg A. C. to D. C. Economizer in his Palace Theatre and secured the light on his screen that he has been striving for ever since going in the picture business. In order to make his Hamilton Theatre thoroughly up to date in this direction, he installed another Hallberg A. C. to D. C. Economizer.

PICTURE MUSIC

By ERNST LUZ

For Exhibitors' Special Attention

This department, while primarily conducted for the benefit of the picture musician, with the view of assisting him to musically interpret the pictures in more creditable manner, realizes only too well that unless the exhibitor and musician co-operate to a certain degree, the better results will to a great extent be lost, for the lack of musical results in the picture theatre will financially affect the exhibitor, while the blunt of severe criticism is the musician's only allotment, which too often is passed over lightly with a feeling that broad shoulders will carry much blame. Incidental to my addition of the picture music thematics each week to this department, I feel it expedient to address these few words to the exhibitor, knowing as a fact that the better results of my efforts will revert to the good of the exhibitor as well as the musician. The co-operation above suggested differs in all cases, and the means must be suggested by the ways, viz., if you are paying your pianist or musician a wage creditable and commensurate with conditions in your individual localities you can demand and expect that he or they be properly equipped with a good and up-to-date repertoire; on the other hand, if you are getting your musical talent from the ranks of the lowest bidders, disregarding their ability or experience, it is your duty to provide them with repertoire if you hope to obtain any results whatsoever. The thematic explanations of each number as they appear will explain their value for the picture theatre to a layman; leaving the proper rendition of the same to the musician, any exhibitor will soon know the possible results obtainable. You should know that the slap-stick, rough-and-ready drama, as well as the old Kramer style of melodrama, is a thing of the past, and if you desire to get the full value out of the present moral, advanced thought and problem plays, you will find that corresponding music properly used, will get them over (as it is termed in the vaudeville vernacular), and they will be more appreciated than any Western or blood-and-thunder drama you ever heard tell off. This is not meant in the form of criticism, as I am not in the least ambitious to be an agitator or dictator, and advocate only that which I know will elevate the picture theatre and place it on so high a level that it will be beyond all criticism. Regardless of what you pay, you should be assured that your pianist or musician should at least be able to read music and be able to play numbers without the aid of a tutor. It is not necessary that the pianist should be a Paderewski or able to play a Liszt transcription, for a continual rendition of heavy technical numbers is of little value to the pictures. Such numbers are meant to be used when displaying advanced ability, they never are expressive of thought and should be used as solos or between reels where such a method is in vogue. The numbers I suggest are all tried out before they enter this paper and they are renderable by all pianists who can, as I said before, read music, it being understood that the better musician will play them at sight, the less competent will need to fit them to their fingers, which in all cases is easily done with little practice. You can be further assured that each number has the thematic picture value I claim for it and the picture pianist or musician will find them more valuable after becoming acquainted with them. The numbers, to be properly rendered, do not require that the pianist be an acrobat, for they require only a quiet and expressive rendition to give the proper thought.

While some pictures are better portrayed with known classics from the compositions of the old masters, it should be a satisfaction to know that the music in your theatre should be up to the minute, which is another point that will be taken care of in this department. I have often advocated the use of popular song hits to be played in consecutive form for the usual farce-comedy and certain lengthy series of scenes in comedy dramas; by this is not meant that the ragging of two or three songs through an entire picture will suffice, for in my experience it has required from sixteen to twenty-two numbers to last an entire picture without making it tiresome. The fact that you use popular song settings for your comedies and certain descriptives will make the better music used in dramas and classics more impressive. There are never less than one or two hundred songs popular at any one time, so there is no excuse for the continual thumping of one or two numbers. This will also be closely followed in this department with a view of assisting you as an exhibitor to keep your theatre strictly up-to-date musically. It has required much diplomacy and effort to create suitable co-operation with the music publishers. To what extent I have succeeded you can best judge by following my "Picture Thematics of Musical Publications." I can further assure you that my professional card was of greater value in obtaining professional courtesies than a hundred moving picture music theories. It will be a source of great pleasure to me to be able to transfer some of these courtesies to the progressive exhibitor and musician, knowing that such a mutual co-operation will wonderfully advance that greatly needed and better "Picture Music."

I call your special attention to the offers in this week's issue, and in getting this music, hand it to the pianist or musician and allow him to become acquainted with it, for then you can expect results.

There is a natural instinct within every musician to condemn that music which, at the first reading, does not appeal to their fancy, and having personally passed through such a state many years ago, I realize only too well the disadvantages of such a course. The very best musicians require more than one reading to give any composition its proper tone and thought value.

To make professional copies more durable and add to their stability on the music rack, bind the three open sides with passe partout binding, folding it over the edge. This will also simplify the turning of pages. After binding place them under a heavy weight while drying to press them perfectly flat.

In pictures of quiet action, based on romantic or sentimental thought, such as Selig's releases "A Child Shall Lead Them," "Don't Let Mother Know," "Vintage of Fate," "A Counterfeit Santa Claus;" Edison's "Leonie," "Lorelei," "The Man He Might Have Been;" Essanay's "The Virtue of Rags," "When Soul Meets Soul;" Kalem's "A Life in the Balance" and many others which tell a beautiful story minus violent action, can be beautifully and effectively accompanied by having a few waltzes on your stand of the slow and legato type, such as those published by the Daly Music Publishing Company and listed in the "Picture Thematics" this week. Have a number such as "Longing for Home" or "Simple Confession" ready for the more serious moments and a light and catchy intermezzo for the more active descriptive scenes, which usually occur in the middle of the picture. Such numbers as Paul Lincke's "Amina" or the "Arabian Knights" mentioned in last week's News, are especially catchy and make beautiful relief numbers when preceding or following a slow sustained waltz or tone-poem. In such pictures never hurry your tempos. These same pictures seldom require dramatic numbers other than a dramatic pizzicato for a sneakly entrance or a mysterioso for the purpose of accentuating a heavy cast character or villain.

To avoid the abuse of the different publishers' offers it is necessary in ordering music that you mention the theatre in which you play, own or manage, and to get the exact numbers mentioned in my thematics, you must mention the Moving Picture News. I would caution you under no circumstances to pass these offers to private individuals or friends, for they will not be recognized, and if subterfuge is used, it will be necessary to withdraw all offers from respective localities from whence such requests come. Our complete list of picture theatres in the United States is at all times available to the publishers.

Remember that regardless of circumstances or ability, you are raised to the standard of a "professional," and you should make every effort to retain, not abuse it. This is not an advertising scheme and strictly co-operative with but one purpose in mind, viz.: "Better Picture Music."

PICTURE THEMATICS OF MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS

Valuable Waltzes and 2/4 Numbers.

Garden of Love, waltz by Walter Rolfe; Wistaria, waltz by May Greene; Poinsettia, Roses and Violets, Bridal Roses and Scented Roses, waltzes all composed by Jos. M. Daly.

These six waltzes are all of the sustained slow legato kind I have so often suggested for sentimental and romantic scenes. All contain beautiful, yet simple, modulations which add to their thought value and impressiveness. Are more beautiful when played slow and with expression. Are not difficult and can be played by any pianist after a few readings. Each contains beautiful themes for the following of refined female characters.

Hypnotic Rag, by Ed. C. Mahony. A number that will immediately fit itself to your fingers and excellent for descriptive (not violent) action in Westerns or dramas which contain much action.

Chicken Reel and Daly's Reel, by Jos. Daly. Two excellent buck and reel march numbers especially appropriate for the opening of rural comedy or comedy drama pictures. Both will appeal and are not difficult.

Uncle Sam's Boys, by Bart. E. Grady. A march with a genuine march swing in 6/8 tempo. Good for the lighter moments in military dramas, also for finales to Westerns wherein action is hilarious and many male characters participate.

The rags and reels are better in M.M.-96 Quarter.

Bridal Roses, Scented Roses, Roses and Violets, Poinsettia and Garden of Love Waltzes, Daly's Reel, Chicken Reel and Hypnotic Rag will be sent you postage prepaid upon receipt of 5 cents each for regular piano copies by the publisher, Jos. M. Daly, Music Publisher, Gaiety Theatre Bldg., 665 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

The waltzes are excellent and none of them are in professional copies. Mr. Daly also offers to send complete sets of professional copies of his latest instrumental and vocal numbers, such as I Got You, Steve and My Beautiful Rose for 25 cents postage prepaid.

Orchestrations of any of above number will be mailed at 15 cents each.

EXCELLENT OFFER FOR PICTURE PIANISTS

Angel's Serenade, arr. by Sidney Smith. Longing for Home, by Jungman. Simple Confession, by Thorne. Traumerei and Romance, by Schumann. Four excellent pathetic numbers. The thought value of each number is well expressed in its title. All are very effective for series of vision scenes of sentimental nature. Secret Love, gavotte by Resch. Stephanie, gavotte arr. by Stenhammer. Two gavottes that will be good fifty years from now. Excellent for pictures of court life or descriptive action in plays of olden days. Anvil Chorus, from Il Trovatore, by Verdi. The title suggests its use. Convent Grand March, by Nichols. Excellent for pageants or the following of kings and nobles in court dramas. Funeral March, by Chopin. Padishah, Persian march by Lorraine. Characteristic. La Paloma, by Stenhammer. Excellent for love scenes or sentimental action in Mexican or Spanish dramas. Largo, by Handel. Strictly devotional. Appropriate for all quiet and pathetic action surrounded with an atmosphere of the church. The above twelve numbers are all well-known standard numbers, excellently arranged for piano and not difficult. Good music years ago, now, and will be appreciated fifty years hence. You will have no difficulty in finding opportunities to use such numbers.

Regular two and three colored title-page piano parts of the twelve above-mentioned numbers will be sent to you, postage prepaid, for 50 cents. If any one has any of these numbers already in their repertoire they can obtain any portion of the set at 5 cets each from the publishers, Fair Music Co., Hicks Bldg., Broadway and 28th St., New York City.

Orchestrations of all the above numbers can be obtained from Carl Fischer, Mus. Pub., 48-50 Cooper Square, New York City. See his catalogue for price list. 25 per cent discount to Orch. Leaders.

THE BETTER WAY

(Ramo Release March 12th)

The first release of the Ramo Film Company, which is entitled "The Better Way," promises success for this newly organized company, and real entertainment for the public.

It is a strong, clean drama that leaves the auditor with something to think about—leaves him with a desire to maintain his own self-respect against the ravages and debasement attendant on the excessive use of alcohol.

The story is of a young wife, who, disgusted and discouraged with conditions as they have developed in her home through her husband having become a drunkard, is tempted to elope with an old acquaintance who recrosses her path at this particularly trying point of her career.

Appalled at the unhappy conditions surrounding the young woman, Tom Horton, the old-time friend, pleads with her to leave all the misery behind her and accompany him to South America where he has been assigned a position.

* * * *

The young wife after some thought on the matter consents, packs her grip and is about to depart with him when Pauline, the tiny daughter of the unhappy family, appears in the hall dressed and with her little satchel also packed and in hand. The child, who has seen her mother packing her grip, and has concluded that she is going to take her on a visit, brings one of the strongest touches of pathos into the story. It is when the child appears before her mother and snuggles up to her in childish innocence, expecting to be taken along on the journey, that her resolution weakens. In the meantime the husband has found the note from Horton to his wife asking her to go with him, and has also listened to the conversation in the hall. The result is that he becomes from that time on a changed man, and where misery had reigned henceforth is destined to abide ideal happiness.

Some time ago the Selig Polyscope Company's Chicago studio producing staff started work in a special series of exceptional melodramas and comedies, employing in the principal role the famous and almost human white horse Arabia. It is said that this horse even talks and the series of pictures will be looked forward to with unusual interest. During the production of one of the pictures last week Oscar Eagle, the director, was attempting to show the equine actor a new piece of business. Arabia did not approve of the suggestion and showed his displeasure by biting a good-sized piece of flesh from the palm of Mr. Eagle's hand. A few days later the horse bit his trainer. Now the producers are finding difficulty to secure players who will work with the dumb wonder for fear of incurring his equine majesty's displeasure.

URBAN-ECLIPSE—GEORGE KLEINE

THE WAGES OF TRANSGRESSION (March 5).—In response to an urgent request from his friend Adams, Charles Palmer lends him a large sum of money, secretly hoping thus to win the respect of the charming Mrs. Adams, whom he greatly admires. At first his attentions are only slightly regarded, but as he becomes more insistent she vigorously repulses him. At a sumptuous dinner party given in his honor, Palmer is most devoted to Mrs. Adams. During the evening he tries to get her to accept a note from him, and when she refuses he sneaks into her dressing room and slips the message into her glove.

Before the evening is over little Dolly Adams, who has been put to bed early, decides to join the party, and, arraying herself in her mother's dress, hat and gloves, enters the room, calling forth a flood of laughter from the guests as she struts about in their midst.

Taking the child in his arms, her father discovers the note in his wife's glove and with great astonishment reads the message from Palmer threatening her happiness unless she returns his affection. Immediately he calls the false friend into an adjoining room and a struggle ensues in which the latter pays for his transgression with his life.

On the same reel:

POTTERY MAKING IN DORSET, ENGLAND.—An interesting and instructive visit to the potteries in Verwood. We are shown the treading of the clay, the potter's wheel at work, the kilns where the crockery is dried. A collection of beautiful vessels exquisitely moulded concludes the subject.

CINES—GEORGE KLEINE

NIPPED IN THE BUD (Mar. 4).—Willie is sent to the city to study law, but soon neglects his work, because friends persuade him that he has great talent for the stage. He resolves to attempt a career in that direction and interviews a theatrical manager, who offers to "star" him. Willie has plenty of confidence and his first appearance proves a great success, until, to his consternation, his father appears at the theatre in search of him. Catching sight of Willie, the angry parent rushes upon the stage and forcibly ejects the principal actor, thus putting an end to the show. The next time we see Willie he is back on the farm working hard and occasionally lamenting the fact that his talent should be wasted thus.

On the same reel:

WANTED—A HUSBAND.—Two old cronies, Stout and Thynne, notice that a wealthy widow is advertising for a husband, and decide to put in their applications at once. Thynne arrives first, but at the sight of the widow's face and her six noisy children, he quickly decides to make his escape. When Stout calls, however, he is not a bit frightened, for he is a widower with four children of his own. The more the merrier is Stout's motto, and later he scoffs at Thynne's facetious remarks for he is now the happiest man in town.

THANHOUSER

HIS HEROINE (March 4).—He was a hardheaded old business man, and very mercenary. So, when he received a letter from a debtor in a little country town asking for more time in which to pay the amount he owed, he decided to show no mercy.

But on the way to the home of the debtor, he had an accident. He slipped and fell from a cliff upon a projecting ledge below. He was thinking less of his money than of the chances of prolonging his life when he heard some one call him, and looking up he saw a girl standing on the cliff. She was quick-witted and resourceful for she soon secured a rope, lowered herself to where the man was, and helped him back to safety. To his surprise he found that she was the daughter of the man whom he had intended to turn out of his home. He spent a short time at the girl's home, recovering from a slight injury sustained during his accident, and then proposed to return to the city, assuring the anxious father that he could have all the time he wanted to pay his mortgage. His farewell of the girl was very sentimental, for she was fair to look upon, and the crabbed old bachelor persuaded himself that he was in love.

As time went by, the old business man kept thinking continually of the girl. He decided that she would consider it a great honor to marry him, so he wrote a letter asking her to marry him, and enclosing the mortgage on her father's place.

Strange to say, the girl was not flattered when she received the proposal. Fortune had been kind to her father of late, and he had ample funds to pay the mortgage. So she wrote a very indignant letter to her ancient suitor, and closed the epistle with these words: "Must I marry you because I saved your life? If so come back and I will push you off the cliff and give another girl a chance. Take back your mortgage."

The old bachelor received the mortgage and the letter in due course, and at first was very angry, but deep within him was a well of unsuspected humor, and as he read the closing lines of the letter he threw back his head and laughed long and heartily.

And the mortgage was never foreclosed, for its holder tore it up.

HER NEIGHBOR (March 7).—The young artist had determined to devote her life "for art." She wasn't a great painter, she never would be one, yet she believed that she saw her mission clear and "mere man" had no part in her dreams. A number of her girl friends encouraged her in the notion, and all had determined to live in single blessedness for the rest of their days.

While her enthusiasm was at its height a distant relative died and left the girl an orange grove in California. She determined to share her good luck with her chums, and invited them to aid her in establishing an "Adamless Eden." They accepted with enthusiasm, made the journey with her, and promptly ousted the men they found at work in the grove, declaring that they (the girls) would look after everything themselves.

For a time all was lovely, but this condition did not last. The girl found to her sorrow that her chums were not only unfitted for the work, but they were also lazy. Seemingly all they knew about oranges was how to eat them, and this they did energetically, spicing the dessert with discourses on the uselessness of man. The young proprietor lamented, but revived somewhat when an interesting man came into her life. He was her neighbor, the owner of the adjoining orange grove, and she soon grew to like him very much. He was always helpful, reliable, and could be depended upon to be on hand when wanted. Their friendship grew and finally the other girls became aware of it. There was a scene, and the young orange grove proprietor was deserted by all of her indignant apostles. Lonely and forlorn she prepared to go back to the city, although her mission did not appear as important as it once had been. Just at the right moment, however, the man came along, and in his masterful way solved the problem of the future.

You see, orange groves suggest orange blossoms and orange blossoms suggest brides, and frequently mighty poor artists make loving, affectionate wives, and so it proved in this case.

AMERICAN

CALAMITY ANNE, DETECTIVE (March 10).—Calamity Anne climbed down from her loft and stretched herself lazily. Then she went to her one faithful friend, her burro, and arranged breakfast for two.

Three miles away Rattlesnake Pete, by way of diversion, soundly and thoroughly beat Mrs. Rattlesnake Pete and took his way with his ferocious pal to the cache, where the stolen money was hidden.

Simultaneously the sheriff posted up a $500 reward notice for the same pair, and aroused the cupidity of "Know-It-All Jones," who, revolver in hand, went in search of that five hundred.

Now, it fell out that Calamity, seeing the notice, also needed cash; so when a suspicious character appeared, hied him toward the sheriff at the point of her gun. Alas! The sheriff dismissed her with the remark that a harmless old tramp was a poor excuse. So Calamity ity, in disgust, left.

Later she fell upon the real bandit, and so knocked the wind out of the husky body of Rattlesnake Pete that the desperado in panic fled down the road. His pal also fled straight into the arms of "Know-It-All Jones," who promptly helped him along toward the sheriff. Then Calamity, overhauling her victim again, fell upon him with such frightful effect that the poor wretch fled straight into the sheriff's arms for protection.

And then, horror of horrors, the sheriff refused the reward on the ground that the bandit had given himself up—and, to make matters worse, Calamity beheld "Know-It-All Jones" collect his change and depart.

Heart-sick, Calamity left, and shortly after, with only Calamity's luck, fell straight upon the cache wherein was hidden the dough. With this Calamity, in righteous indignation, decided to vamoose, but on the way, leading her burro, came upon the house of Rattlesnake Pete, and there saw his weeping and poverty-stricken wife. Calamity's tender heart gave way. She hauled the bags of dust from her bosom and presented them to the unfortunate wife, leaving with a light heart and a heavy laden burro, for parts unknown.

BROTHER LOVE (March 13).—Jimmy Mason was blind and lived with his brother in their cabin in the mountains. Jimmy longed for the good things of life and when a noted specialist came to the village, he took pity on the hapless youth and promised to restore his sight. Jimmy was sent to town and the doctor, after giving him a pair of glasses with the advice not to remove them within a certain length of time, sent him forth.

But sight was so welcome to Jimmy that he wandered about the city admiring its beautiful hotels and streets. He saw and grew acquainted with a girl who discarded him promptly when his money gave out. And then, walking out on the docks, Jimmy fell in with some dock roustabouts, who, for the sake of a joke, tore off the shaded glasses. Stricken blind, the boy fell on the pier.

Meanwhile, the brother, alone in the mountains, grew restless. He went to town, traced his wayward brother, and rescued him just when the latter was about to step into the sea.

Happy in his love for his brother, Jimmy, now blind forever, returned to his cabin in the hills.

EDISON

ANN (March 4).—Ann McDonald is the only child of stern, orthodox and straightlaced parents. Their love for her is obscured by rigidity of training. Sunday is made a day of torture for her. Her father loved the shadow and not the substance of Christianity. He loved his Bible and the mottoes on his parlor wall read "Love One Another" and "God Is Love," but in daily life he gave none of that essence to his child. Ann, in desperation, runs away leaving a pathetic letter, saying that their cruelty has driven her away.

She goes to the city and there encounters that essence that failed her at home. That love was shown by her landlady, Viola Montague, a former burlesque queen, who saw in Ann an innocence like unto her own in her girlish days. She resolved to protect her.

Ann's father goes to the city in search of her, and finally sees her enter a casino. He follows her and demands that she return home. She denies him as her father and he returns home crushed. Ann is taken away by the landlady, who paints things to her as they really are, and then takes her home.

In the last scene we see the father reading the Bible. His eyes fall on the text "He that troubleth his own house shall inherit the wind," and when Ann enters the room and steals into his waiting arms, he at last realizes that he is at fault. A happier future is promised her.

A LETTER TO UNCLE SAM (March 5).—Uncle Sam's heavy target practice of a nearby fort jars little seven-year-old Marion's doll from the table in the nursery, shattering it on the floor. The child is heartbroken at her dolly's fate, and at a loss to understand the cause of it, until the nurse, to pacify her, explains that the firing of Uncle Sam's guns at the fort jarred the dolly off the table. Upon learning this little Marion becomes indignant and decides to write a letter to Uncle Sam complaining about the damage. To humor her the nurse good-naturedly aids her in carrying out her desire, and the letter is mailed.

At Washington, D. C., Marion's letter to Uncle Sam is opened in the postmaster general's office and turned over to the War Department, where it receives immediate attention. Orders are issued to the commanding officer at the fort to investigate the damage and make such compensation and apologies as may be deemed proper.

A committee of two young officers is appointed at the fort and they proceed with due ceremony to investigate the damage claim. At Marion's home they are surprised to find the claimant to be a pretty little child. They consider the matter gravely, and while there are presented to Marion's sisters, two most attractive young women.

The young officers lose their hearts to the girls and report progress to their commanding officer. Secretly they each buy a huge doll and repair to Marion's home to present it to her. Again they meet the young ladies, who receive them most graciously.

Little Marion is quite happy with her two unexpected new dollies, while her older sisters seem equally happy with their unexpected sweethearts; the result of a jar.

GREAT NORTHERN

OUTWITTED (March 8).—Early in this comedy subject the fact is made clear that Kitty, a charming young widow, has attracted the loving attentions of three ardent admirers—Shaleton, a student; Chringham, an army officer, and Arnold, who devotes most of his spare time to hunting. They are three distinct types of manliness, and in their individual efforts to ingratiate themselves into the good graces of the widow, they cause no end of innocent fun and amusing complications. The three gallant admirers are unaware, however, that the young widow is in love with Dr. Kalart, her son's tutor, and in a spirit of fun, she does not take the pains to acquaint him with her secret. Kalert really is an ardent admirer, but in order to test his sincerity, Kitty causes the rumor to be spread that her fortune has been lost through the failure of a bank. At this juncture, Grace, an heiress and friend of Kitty's, arrives and immediately the attentions of Shaleton, Chringham and Arnold are transferred in her direction. Then it is that the fun develops at a rapid pace. On the day following the arrival of Grace, Dr. Kalert asks Kitty to become his wife, and, realizing that he is more than worthy, she accepts his offer. Meanwhile Grace and Arthur, who is a cousin to Kitty, have fallen in love and their engagement is announced. When the three admirers learn of the situation they accept the situation gracefully, although with sorrow, and extend their congratulations after having confessed that they had been outwitted.

GAUMONT

SWEET FAMILIAR FACES (March 13).—Joe's wife and her mother do their best to spoil him, although he is an incorrigible flirt.

At the home of a friend, Mrs. Brown, Joe makes ardent love when her husband and brother are not looking, much to the dismay of worthy little Mrs. Brown, who is so faithful to her husband that it hurts. Joe hands her this note: "Sweet Cruelty, Your charm unmans me. Meet you I must, for my heart is overflowing. Adoringly yours, Joe."

Mrs. Brown hands the note to her husband. He is a pretty good sport and decides that although Joe is naughty in spots, he is a good soul after all. He, Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Brown's brother call on Joe's wife and his mother-in-law to tell them of Joe's doings. They decide to teach him a lesson. Accordingly Mrs. Brown writes to Joe and tells him that he is irresistible and that she will meet him on the following day.

Joe, in order to carry out the ruse at home, puts on his shooting clothes, takes his gun and goes forth to meet Mrs. Brown. There she is. Hiding around the corner is Joe's wife and his mother-in-law and kin of Mrs. Brown.

Joe's wife takes a fast train to the place where Mrs Brown intended to take Joe, a quiet little cafe in the country. When Joe gets there, happy to the eyes, he receives an awful shock. Who comes out to greet him at the cafe but a waitress who startlingly resembles his wife. Joe almost has nervous prostration.

When he gets in a corner with Mrs. Brown he tells her sweet nothings and sweet somethings and his consternation abates. Who, then, should wait on him, however, but the same woman. Joe almost loses his eyesight looking at her. He is gasping for breath when in comes a woman and a man who sit at the next table. "Good night!" says Joe. "My mother-in-law with your brother!"

Mrs. Brown all the time keeps a straight face and seems entirely innocent. She utterly fails to recognize these people as any she had ever seen before.

Unable to stand it longer, Jos addresses the people and asks them what they mean by following him. In pretended astonishment they ask him what he is talking about. They declare that they don't know him and never saw him before. When Joe has been almost scared to death by these apprehensions, his mother-in-law, wife and Mrs. Brown all stand up and confront him with his naughtiness, whereupon Joe swears off and promises that he won't do it again—that day.

SIMPLE SIMON SUFFERS SORELY (March 20).—Business is bad, yea, even worse at the costumer's shop. Simple Simon as a shipping clerk is a very good hand-organ player. Simon's boss receives a letter from the Dill Pickle Play Co. It is insulting to say the least. It reads: "You Piece of Cheese: Why, in the name of the artless artichoke, do you send Nutt's Roman costumes instead of South African negligee effects. Do you take my audiences for addle-heads? No more business for you! A Hard Nutt."

Simon's boss rakes him over the coals and then rakes him back again. Simon's soul rises in anger. He durst not talk back to the boss and accordingly goes into the costume room and punches the blooming 'eads off of the lay figures. Simon goes out, a very unhappy young man.

come back to life to punish the insulter of their effigies. It is a phenomenon unparalleled in history. They convene and demand that Simon be discharged, and that the costumes be respected, brushed and ironed twice a day. These resolutions are signed by Louis XIV, Clovis (King of the Franks), Henri III, Napoleon, Cardinal Richelieu and Isabeau de Baviere. The outraged personages then proceed to do all kinds of things to Simon. They bounce him round until Simon regrets that his mother and father ever married. The personages then decide that Simon is not forlorn enough. They pull his leg and in fact both legs, until Simon outgrows his personality. This causes Simon's clothes to become mussed. Accordingly, Napoleon gets a heavy hot iron and irons the clothes, and incidentally Simon, until Simon is thick as a ginger-snap. They then carefully fold up Simon and put him into a basket. The peculiar part is that Simon doesn't seem to mind, although he realizes that he is being pressed harder than even his creditors pressed him. It finally turns out to be a dream.

THE DISCOVERY (March 5).—Mr. I. M. Monion falls in love with his stenographer, Maud Mueller, and proposes to her. The pretty young girl informs her employer that she will give him her answer when she returns from her vacation. At the summer resort Miss Mueller meets Mr. Monion's son. The two are constantly together. Finally, young Monion proposes to Maud and is accepted. They are about to be married by the justice of the peace, when the latter informs them that he cannot perform the ceremony unless Miss Mueller produces a birth certificate. Returning to the hotel Monion receives a telegram from his father requesting him to return to the city immediately, as business matters demand his attention. Monion returns to the city. That same afternoon Miss Mueller is struck by an automobile, and rendered unconscious. A doctor is summoned who identifies her. A few weeks later Miss Mueller, now recovered fully from her accident, returns to the city, where upon entering her employer's office, is greeted lovingly by Mr. Monion and his son. I. M. Monion requests the young beauty to give him her answer. He produces an engagement ring, as does the son. Both are overwhelmed when informed by Maud that she cannot marry either of them, because she has discovered that her name is not Maud Mueller, but Maud Mueller Monion, her employer's daughter. Sad at the loss of a charming wife, but happy in the discovery of their lost one, they welcome her into their hearts and home.

THE SOUL OF A ROSE (March 10).—A lovely Rose is blooming in the garden, she is sad for she knows that it is the fate of flowers to bloom for a short time only. The rose sees a couple of lovers and hears the youth swear that he will love the maiden through life and that their souls shall love in heaven. A vision appears and the rose pleads that she may have a soul, that she also may live hereafter. The vision sends a soul into the rose, presents her with a basket of flowers and instructs her to sell them on the streets, and the basket will be filled every morning. The rose becomes a human. She takes humble lodgings in London, dresses neetly but poorly, and goes out to sell the contents of the basket and returns home to rest. In the morning she again goes forth making her stand usually on one corner. She soon becomes known and customers come regularly. Jack Bellingham buys a flower every morning, and, being attracted by her beauty, pauses for a few minutes' chat. Rose is entranced, and one day Jack proposes that she shall meet him for an evening's enjoyment. She has accumulated a little money and goes to a modest store and buys a simple white frock and hat. She meets Jack as per appointment, and he takes her to an Italian restaurant for dinner, after which they go to the theatre. On the way home in the cab, Jack encircles her with his arm and Rose lays her head upon his shoulder. she has found out that she is a woman. On parting at the door the man takes her in his arms and kisses her passionately. For a few weeks Jack is regular in his visits and attentions. Then, one Saturday morning, he tells Rose that he cannot see her that afternoon as he has to entertain some friends of his mother. The girl is sad and goes to the park. There she sees her lover with two ladies in a carriage. The one is elderly, the other young and beautiful. Rose turns away, she tastes sorrow for the first time. The next morning she is not at her post and Jack looks for her in vain. In the evening he goes to the lodging house and the landlady invites him into the parlor and sends Rose to him. They sit together, but the girl is embarrassed. She asks who were the ladies. Jack tells her that they were the wife and daughter of his employer and that his mother wants him to marry the girl. Rose asks him if he intends to carry out his mother's wishes. He will not commit himself and when they part Rose refuses to kiss him. She faints and is taken to her room and lies ill for weeks. When she becomes convalescent Jack is permitted to visit her in her room. He tells her he cannot live without her and begs her to become his wife. A week or two later there is a modest wedding; Rose is very beautiful in her white dress, and Jack tells her so. She says that it is only because she is happy. "The Rose had found her soul."

A KIMONO TRAGEDY (March 2).—Mr. Stone is rather a high-strung man. He is returning from an extensive rest cure taken for his nerves. On the train a stupid porter places a kimono in the wrong grip, which happens to be Stone's. Mr. Stone's wife is a very jealous woman, and when she discovers the kimono in her husband's grip she immediately suspects and trouble brews. To protect himself, because his wife would not believe the true situation of affairs, Stone concocts a story, inducing her to believe the kimono was brought back from his trip as a gift for her. Things seemed smoothed now, but the original owne rof the kimono prizes it very highly and advertises for it, requesting that it be returned to her immediately. Now, Stone is in a precarious predicament; he is afraid to ask his wife for the kimono, and yet, to be honest, he must return it to its owner. Finally he decides that the only thing to do is to buy another as nearly like the lost one as possible and send it to the lady who advertises. Unfortunately his wife happens in upon him while he is making his purchase. Efforts to explain are futile. She threatens all sorts of things. The excitement and suspense are too much for a high-strung man like Stone, and he gives way. The doctor comes—a trained nurse is prescribed. The situation is further aggravated now, for the nurse turns out to be none other than the lady who owned the kimona that started the trouble. Complications follow, but all are finally settled, and a narrowly averted tragedy evolves into a joke.

BRASS BUTTONS (March 4).—Mr. Gay gets an invitation to join a poker game, but as there is a burglar scare in the neighborhood his wife objects to his going out that night, so he persuades his wife to go to bed early so that he can follow instructions of invitation, to go after wife is asleep. But wife reads the note and is wise, and decides to counterplot by locking up Gay's clothes. In the meantime Mary is entertaining the cop in the kitchen. After giving him a good feed, she gives him a drink from a bottle. He shows that he has designs on the bottle, tells Mary about the burglar scare, and persuades her to give him the joy of the kitchen so that he can protect her if necessary.

In the parlor Gay yawns and pretends to be sleepy and proposes to wife to retire early. Wife having laid her plans, consents, and takes the opportunity while he is locking up the house to take his coat and other clothes and lock them in the wardrobe in the bedroom. Gay patiently waits for wife to go to sleep, then finds when she has gone to sleep that he cannot get his clothes without awakening her. The cop outside finds it is a cold night—he enters the kitchen—empties the bottle and goes to sleep. Gay hears him snoring. An idea, he will borrow the cop's coat and surprise his fellows at the club. On his way he disperses a gang of toughs, receives a bribe and a drink from a saloonkeeper, only to find when he gets to the club that the other members flee in terror at the sight of the brass buttons. Gay takes the jack-pot—he wins anyhow.

The cop in the meantime has awakened and starts to look for a bracer. The wife hears a noise, thinks the cop is her husband, and tiptoes up to him and hugs him. Mary, the maid, enters to see Mrs. Gay hugging the cop. But Mrs. Gay screams as she finds she has been hugging a stranger, and runs to her room and locks herself in. Mary is mad at the cop, but the cop dare not leave the house without uniform. Gay, on his way home from the club, recovers the proceeds of a burglary that has been dropped by crooks in their flight. He arrives home with it and tells the cop to take it to the station house, it will mean promotion for him. Gay then makes the place look as if a burglary was committed—calls his wife and poses as a hero. The cop later makes peace with Mary by showing her the added stripe on his arm that he got for his bravery.

THE HAWKINS ROOMER (March 12).—Hawkins is sacked! Out of a job! Mrs. Hawkins takes a roomer to help matters out. Hawkins is suspicious of the gentleman who takes the room. He doesn't like the looks or the way of him. He peeks through the keyhole and his worst suspicions are confirmed. He sees the scoundrel disguising himself with a beard and a wig—a thoroughly desperate character, no doubt. They might all be murdered in their bed sometime.

Hawkins turns sleuth. He follows the villain and sees him go into the bank. He rushes to the corner and summons the police. The monster is captured and taken toward the lockup. The party is met by some plain clothes sleuths, who recognize the man. It is Nick Harris, the famed detective. Hawkins sneaks off home, while the others run to the bank, where they find that the expected burglars have made their visit and that it has been entirely successful. They determine to make an example of Hawkins and visit him in a body. He sees them coming, and, taking his gun, he creeps out to the woodshed to hide. Inside he stumbles on the burglars, who are in hiding. They see the gun and give up to the dazed Hawkins, who delivers them with much ceremony to the detective and police.

Mrs. Hawkins takes the reward and Hawkins has to be content with his wife's acceptance of him as a hero.

THOU SHALT NOT STEAL.—Little Con Rooney is operated upon for a fracture on the head, while under the influence of hypnotism. Years roll on. It is big Con Rooney now, the leader of the gang. He has grown up from boyhood influenced by the pressure of a small bone on his brain, which has incited his brutal and even murderous instincts. He is shot in a brawl at a Bowery dance hall and is removed to the hospital. The doctor, in examining him, discovers the brain pressure, and, placing him under the spell of hypnotism, learns all about the old fracture. He tells Nellie, the nurse, that by relieving the brain pressure Rooney will have a normal man's chance in life.

He is operated on and in due time convalesces, when he is visited by his old companions, who bring him gifts of whiskey and cards. Nellie's good influence is exerted and Rooney is affected and grateful. Nellie teaches him to read and write and gives him a small Bible. She lays particular stress upon the commandment "Thou shalt not steal."

When the time arrives for Rooney's discharge, he begs to be given employment in order that he may not go back to his old haunts and ways. Good fortune comes his way. The hospital janitor is discharged and Rooney is given his place.

Things go well for Rooney until one day a big donation arrives for the hospital after banking hours. It is put in a small safe and its security is entrusted to Rooney. During the night the window is pried up and two of Rooney's old cronies enter and demand the money. Rooney's heart fails him. He fears that his past record will not shield him if he is overpowered and the men get away. In a moment of weakness he agrees, but a vision of Nellie, the Bible and the words "Thou shal not steal," comes to him and after a desperate struggle he throws the men out of the window and summons assistance.

Nellie is called and Rooney falls to his knees crying out, "Miss Nellie, I was true to your teaching and my trust." Rooney's emancipation has come.

FROM DEATH—LIFE (March 13).—In a home of wealth and refinement for days a struggle has waged between the grim reaper and the forces of science backed by everything that love and wealth can bring to the battle. Even as science bows defeated, even a loving mother is driven out of her mind from grief and ceaseless vigils over her baby. A poor wretch at the point of death is turned away from the home by the distracted servants, and takes her halting way to the barn behind the home. Here a child is born beneath the kind eyes of the stabled horses. One of the many physicians in the home is summoned to the stable with a nurse and the baby born in the shadow of a manger is taken to the home, where its feeble cries stop the imminent suicide of the mother whose babe has passed away. The new born babe's clutching fingers bring ease to the mother's heart, the tears flow and her reason returns. The poor driven wretch, who dies friendless, smiles from the great beyond, and the child of "she who is friendless" becomes the joy and care of the mother driven to end her own life, who has obey the great injunction of Him who said "He who receiveth one such little child receiveth me."

ECLAIR

THE STRONGER (Two-reel) (March 12).—Bang! Bang! Two shots rang out on the tense stillness of the frozen northland.

The two young prospectors stopped, arrested by the sound, and then rushed in the general direction of the shots.

They soon came to a clearing with a little log cabin in the center. Almost in front of the cabin door was a mine shaft, and as the boys reached this they saw a little trail of smoke curling up.

Hastily descending the rough ladder they were greeted by a pitiful sight. Huddled in a heap at its foot lay the body of a man. The broken windlass at the top of the well and the smoking revolver in the limp hand, told the mute tale of the accident and the appeal for help. Just as Jack raised the head of the unfortunate miner, the sufferer breathed his last.

"The poor cuss is done for, Fred," said Jack. "Yep," the blamed windlass busted and the fall broke his neck."

"Hello, what's this?" Fred picked up a small slate and spelled out the scrawl on it: "Take care of little Babbie and God will reward you."

"Well, let's find Babbie," said Fred. "Bring that with you," indicating the body of the dead man, and we will get out of here."

Coming to the top of the mine shaft, they entered the mine cabin. There they found Babbie, a little golden-haired, blue-eyed girl of three. Over the body of the dead miner the boys swore to protect and care for this little orphaned baby.

Years later, Babbie, the child, had grown to Babbie, the woman, and a beautiful girl she was, too. As the bud unfolded into the lovely flower, there also developed in the hearts of the two friends a love for their ward. At last, on account of this, their long years of friendship became strained almost to the breaking point.

The crisis came on Babbie's nineteenth birthday. Fred had brought her a beautiful shawl from Skagway, while Jack had presented her with only a little plaster cupid. However, the girl showed a strong preference for the simple love token, and this display of favor caused Fred to display a nasty temper.

That night there was a violent quarrel. The culmination came when Jack said, "I am the stronger. I have always done all of the hardest work. I have done more for her than you. Why should she not prefer me?"

Fred contained himself with effort. At last he said, in a suppressed tone, "All right Jack. From now on we are sworn enemies. But don't let Babbie know."

Several days later, a dying miner staggered up to the cabin. He dies in Jack's arms. In his coat was found a map, locating a very rich vein of gold. Jack rushed away to follow the map's directions, but just as he discovered the mine and was staking it off, Fred, who had followed him, staked his claim alongside. There was another clash, but Fred declared his intentions of fighting, with the remark, "You have not yet recorded and I have the fastest dog team in the country."

So it became a race to have the claim filed. Side by side sped the sledges, drawn by the husky plungers. Now, Jack was in the lead. Now Fred. It was anybody's race. When they were about a mile from the settlement Fred's leader broke and so disconcerted the rest of the pack that Jack reached the office just ahead of his rival.

Fred, however, would not give up, and he followed Jack back to the mine. Arriving there the two men began quarreling again.

At last they decided to leave the verdict to the Colts at twenty paces. Just as they were taking their places, Fred stopped suddenly with a cry of terror. Look! My God! Our cabin's on fire! Immediately all thought of the quarrel vanished. Silently, side by side the two men raced to the burning shack. Both rushed inside. But Jack reached the unconscious form of the girl ahead of Fred. Picking her up in his arms he carried her out.

It was not until Babbie had recovered from her faint that they became aware of the fact that Fred was still inside the fiercely burning cabin. Jack plunged back through the flames to rescue his erstwhile partner. At last, almost overcome by the intense heat and smothering smoke, he reached the helpless form. Raising him he started for the door, but the weakened floor gave way under his feet and both were hurled into the shaft that years before had claimed the life of Babbie's father.

They were both rescued by the neighboring prospectors, only to find that Fred was crippled and Jack blinded.

However, after several weeks had passed Jack recovered from the effects of his burns. His eyes soon healed and his eyesight was restored.

But Fred was still in bed. During all their weeks of suffering Babbie had nursed both men with tender care. Still, Jack could see that gradually she was beginning to show preference for the crippled Fred. It was hard to give her up. It tore his heart strings to do it. Yet, Fred needed Babbie and undoubtedly she loved him very, very much. Her woman's nature drew her with irresistible force to the shattered man.

When both had their health and power, Jack had always been the strongest. Now that he was many, many times stronger physically than Fred, would he prove to be the weaker in will? No, never.

Calling Reed-in-the-Wind, an Indian woman, who had been Babbie's nurse ever since they had adopted her, he gave her a note for Fred. With one last look around the old familiar cabin, he passed out into the night to fight his battle alone.

When Reed-in-the-Wind gave the message to Fred, he found it was wrapped around a razor. He read, "Dear Pal: I am the stronger and strong enough to bear my loss. If you want the girl to love you, shave off your whiskers." (Signed) Jack, the loser.

Fred did shave and when Babbie saw him looking so young again it brought an end to all indecisions. He was to be her future lord and master.

It is another one of the Eclair series of the Northwest that have found so much favor. It has an interest-compelling theme that abounds with tense and dramatic situations. The sled race and the fice scene are particularly exciting.

WHEN HE WANTS A DOG HE WANTS A DOG.—Eclair Newlywed Series (Mar. 16).—Everybody knows him. In fact, this funny youngster is probably the best known little fellow who has ever made his formal bow to the American people, although he is really better known for his "wow" than for his bow.

Snookums Newlywed will be the hero of this first of a wonderful series of comedy subjects.

The Newlywed cartoons by McManus have caused millions to laugh. They contain genuine humor, and even in their still form have been very, very popular.

Eclair now presents this great series in a more attractive form, in that the funny young couple and their homely baby are made to move in a most laughable manner. These pictures are not really people dressed up in an effort to imitate these cartoons, but they are the cartons themselves in action. They must be seen to be appreciated, and after you see the first, nothing can keep you from watching for the rest of the series.

The story of the first release concerns Snookums' acquaintance with a dog, which quickly ripens into friendship. Snookums decides suddenly that he must have the dog, and he proceeds to let out an awful string of those terrible wows when doggie rides away in the automobile of his owner.

Papa Newlywed does his best to buy the dog, without success. Finally, he decides to become a bold, bad burglar and goes in the night to take forcible possession of the pet, but the result is most interesting, as well as funny, because Papa Newlywed gets decidedly the worse of the encounter.

He returns home in a barrel to find Snookums sleeping peacefully, and his wife cautioning him not to make any noise.

This series of pictures is going to be the sensational comedy success of the year. They are not an untried proposition, since they have already caused hundreds of hardened picture exchange men and buyers to shriek with laughter.

CRYSTAL

WHO IS THE GOAT? (March 16).—Pearl and her husband have saved up $400. Their uncle visits them. Fearing burglars they have the money hid in the writing desk. Pearl removes it and places it in a vase atop the mantelpiece. Uncle, alone one day in the parlor, reaches up for a match and knocks over the vase. He immediately rushes around with the fragments to the ash can and throws them in, together with the $400. He then goes to a crockery store and buys an exact duplicate of the vase he broke. Returning he puts the vase in its accustomed place. Meanwhile the driver of the ash wagon calls and removes the valuable can of waste. Pearl and her husband then pay a visit to the parlor and, looking into the vase are mortified to find the money missing. They accuse the servant girl of stealing it, and a fight ensues, the maid immediately quitting her job. Pearl, in tears, and uncle, enters to find the small family in confusion. They inform him that the vase was their hiding place, and he rushes pell mell out of the room to the ash can. He finds it empty and he begins to realize that his ruse of replacing the vase was not so easy as contemplated. While the backs of Pearl and her husband are turned he deposits $400 in the vase, and taking it down, shows them the money, telling them it was there all the time and that they had overlooked it, but all the time he is kicking himself at being the goat.

On the same reel:

CALICOWANI.—Captain Blake bids his wife farewell and starts on a voyage to the Fiji Islands. He and his crew are shipwrecked and he is the only surviving member. He lands on a desert island, and, after walking for days, falls asleep in a secluded spot. There he is discovered by Princess Calicowani, the daughter of Chief Etaholelot of the cannibal tribe. At first she is amazed at the strange sight, but becomes reconciled to the fact that the captain is human and claims him as her own. Unable to understand her language he acquiesces in everything she says. She feeds him and he is satisfied. Meanwhile he is introduced to Calicowani's father as her fiance, and his black friends, arriving on the spot, are notified of that fact. Things go well for a while, until the tribe runs out of food and then the members decide that the captain would make a good roast. They seize him despite Calicowani's entreaties and protests and string him up preparatory to building a fire under him. Meanwhile the captain's wife, thinking him dead, marries another man, whom she henpecks to her heart's content. However, just as the captain is about to become a royal subject for the cannibals' stew, a body of American sailors arrive and rescue him. Calicowani mourns her loss, but the captain goes back with his countrymen. He visits his old home after his arrival and is surprised to find his wife married again. They believe him a ghost and the captain is left to his own thoughts of the strange wedding he was nearly a participant in with the beautiful negro princess as his fate for life.

One of the best comedies of the year, abounding in beautiful scenes of the Far East, absolutely unique in its conception, and very capably produced and portrayed.

NESTOR

WITH A GRAIN OF SALT (March 14).—The Senor Pedro Gonzos lives with his daughter Anita in their once rich home. Gonzos has gambled and is lazy, and their fortunes have dwindled. Carlos is engaged to Anita and awaits some rich coup to marry her. Living with them is a young cousin, Leona, who being adopted, is made to feel her position keenly and her gentler nature is dominated by the more assertive Anita.

Visions of gain arise with the arrival of the rich young American, Rob Allison, who bears a letter of introduction informing Pedro that Rob is seeking good investments.

Rob soon comprehends Leona's position, and his sympathies go out to her, but Anita exercises all her powers of fascination and keeps him by her as much as possible.

The trio lose no time in getting as much of Rob's wealth as possible, and Leona rebels, as she sees Pedro cheating the young man at cards, aided by the wily Anita.

The grand coup is planned. Carlos carefully salts the placer grounds and Rob is led like a lamb to the slaughter. He takes his own samples, but is unaware that he is led to the right spot to take them. The gravel is panned and big streaks of gold show in the pan, and Rob is delighted and signifies his intention of purchasing the prospects. Leona is aware of the salting and makes up her mind to impart her knowledge to Rob. An idea strikes her, and she sprinkles his viands liberally with salt. He makes a wry face and catches her eye, but mistakes her motive and, scraping the salt from his food, continues his meal for fear of getting her into trouble.

Leona is desperate and, as the documents are spread out, ready to sign, Leona sees Carlos pour some of the gravel onto a plate in order to emphasize the richness of the prospective mine. Leona creeps up and pours some real salt on the gravel. Her action is observed by Anita in the doorway and by Rob, who, looking up at her, at last comprehends.

There is a fight and Rob emerges victorious. He takes Leona away with him and together they look forward to happiness.

RELIANCE

THE MAN FROM OUTSIDE (2 reels) (Mar. 5).—Burt and Albert are twin brothers, so exactly alike that no one is able to tell them apart. The only identifying mark is borne by Burt, who has a particularly odd scar on his right wrist. The brothers both love Lucille Dayton, daughter of a wealthy stock broker. She prefers Burt, and accepts his proposal. Albert is furious and sets about for some way in which he can dishonor his brother and win the girl himself. Finally he forges his own name to a check and, by appearing at his club, establishes an alibi and makes it appear as though Burt had passed the check. Burt is arrested and sent to jail. Lucille believes in him and vows to be faithful to him. His brother out of the way, Albert ruins the girl's father. The old man dies and the girl is left penniless to earn a living. Albert tells her that sooner or later she will come to him. He has her discharged from every position she manages to get. About this time Burt is released from jail and is unable to find either Lucille or his brother. Despondent he joins an underworld gang and is soon assigned to rob a house. This happens to be his own brother's. He enters the richly furnished room, switches on the lights and the twin brothers are face to face. Burt denounces Albert—and he, overcome, and seized by an attack of heart failure, falls dead. Burt dresses in his brother's clothes and, ringing for a servant, has the body carried out as that of a vagrant. Unable to get work, Lucille seeks Albert's home. Burt comes down to find the girl he has sought crouching in a chair by the fire. He goes to her; she shrinks away from him, saying only "I came because I was hungry!" Burt takes her in his arms and makes her understand who he is. Breaking down she sobs out all the horror of the past few months when she was always persecuted by his brother and how she was on the brink of yielding to his demands because he was making life so hard for her. Burt comforts her, saying, "We have both been on the brink of sin—let us start anew together."

JUST JANE (Mar. 8).—Jane is a little slavey working in a boarding house. She is very much abused by the landlady and has no happiness in life at all. A handsome but very poor young artist moves into the house and is kind to the girl—so much kinder than anyone else ever was that she soon loses her heart to him, child though she is. He does not dream of such a thing—for there is another girl—rich and beautiful, to whom he is engaged. His pictures do not sell and his sweetheart, angered at his impoverished condition, returns his ring in a moment of pique. Jane sees the artist return to his lonely room—and knows he is discouraged and unhappy. What can she do for him? There is but one thing in her life that means sunshine—a poor little kitten. But if it will bring any comfort to him, she will gladly give it. The boy is touched by the gift and accepts it gladly. In the meantime the girl repents and follows the artist to the boarding house. Jane opens the door and when she asks for the boy the little slavey takes her to him, though with breaking heart. She sees them make up—hears the few whispered words of love and, hidden against the door, she watches them depart in the big waiting motor car. Only the kitten is left—forgotten like herself. Gathering it into her arms she weeps with her head hidden in its soft fur. But she is glad—so glad that he is happy at last.

PATHE

PATHE'S WEEKLY NO. 10 (Mar. 3).

THE BUTTERFLY OF A DAY (Mar. 4).—The history of the Ephemera, or common yellow butterfly that lives only from sunrise to sunset, is unfolded herein by means of various microscopic views. After the butterfly has taken wing the camera follows its destiny through gloriously colored fields and beautiful flowers. The film is both pleasing to the eye and enlightening to the mind.

On the same reel:

COD FISHING FROM A TRAWLER.—A delightful journey to the fishing banks to witness the catching and handling of a boatload of enormous cod.

On the same reel:

THE TITMOUSE.—The Titmouse has been termed "The Defender of Our Orchards," and the reason for this sobriquet is clearly shown in a series of beautifully colored views of the Titmouse at work and at play.

THE WATERFALLS OF IDAHO (Mar. 5).—From almost an arid waste the plains of Idaho have been converted into a beautiful and productive farming country by the harnessing of the very numerous waterfalls of the State for irrigation purposes. The process by which this transformation is obtained is clearly shown and explained. Aside from all this the waterfalls are remarkable for their natural beauty, and especially Shoshone Falls, which are considerably higher than Niagara, although their volume is not so great.

On the same reel:

THE HAIRY AINUS.—An interesting study of the peculiar people who inhabit the islands to the north of Japan and to whom civilization has not yet penetrated.

AN EQUINE HERO (Mar. 6).—Being left alone with a consignment of gold, Lulu Atwood, the daughter of the postmaster, mails a note to her sweetheart, Tom Kimball, telling him that she is fearful of bandits because of the gold, and asking him to come to her house. Tom sends Peggy, his highly intelligent horse, to get his mail, but Peggy, returning with the note in her teeth, is met by bandits, who lead her to their rendezvous and tie her. She loosens, with her teeth, the knot in the rope, takes the note from the bandit's pocket and away with it to Tom. When Tom reaches Lulu's house he finds her bound and gagged and the bandits waiting for him. Neither he nor Lulu will tell where the gold is hidden and in despair the bandits bind them to the railroad tracks and leave them. Peggy proves herself an equine hero, however, by liberating the lovers in the nick of time.

HYDROGEN (Mar. 7).—In this film a toy balloon, filled with hydrogen, is deflated and the gas used in several experiments, all clearly explained in the sub-titles. Each experiment is highly interesting, showing just what hydrogen will and will not do. Scenes are shown explaining the method of transporting this combustible gas and also the inflating of a passenger balloon with a capacity of 6,000 cubic feet of hydrogen, which sails gracefully away, thus proving that hydrogen is fifteen times lighter than air.

On the same reel:

THE GRANJA.—Views of the grounds surrounding the palace of the King of Spain. A sight most entrancingly beautiful and the feature of it all is a number of intermittent fountains, the most famous in all Europe.

GOING SOME (Mar. 8).—Just an ordinary difference of opinion, but what unusual difficulties it brought to the man who believed Roosevelt would win. He backed his judgment with a freak bet, but the Bull Mooser was game enough to take his medicine, which consisted of shaving off half his mustache and wheeling a perambulator through the city streets at noon while wearing evening dress. Things might have gone well for the Bull Mooser at that had not a woman who lost her baby carriage gotten the impression that the Bull Mooser was guilty. She chased him, and a crowd joined to help her, and in a very little while he was going some and everyone who sees it will be laughing some.

PILOT

HOW "THE SPIRIT OF '76" WAS PAINTED (Mar. 6).—No work of art is more popular, not alone throughout the United States, but also throughout the entire civilized world, than the famous painting, "The Spirit of '76." As yet very few are acquainted with the history of how this famous picture came into existence. It was painted by Willard, the American artist, who, prior to the Civil War, was a carriage painter for Amos Tripp, a wagon builder of Wellington, Ohio. After Willard returned from the war, he went back to his original vocation. He conceived the idea of embellishing the wagons with small paintings, which made them very popular with the farmers around that community. Tripp's little daughter one day told Willard she could paint, too, and showed them a babyish sketch, from which Willard evolved his first famous painting, entitled "Pluck." This will be remembered as the picture of three little children in a littletoy cart drawn by a dog who was chasing a rabbit. Thousands of photographic copies of this picture were sold by Ryder, the art dealer of Cleveland, Ohio. It was suggested that Willard should paint a picture for exhibition at the Philadelphia Centennial. Willard then started on a comedy picture, entitled "The Fourth of July Musicians." For the central figure he posed his venerable father, a retired clergyman. While painting this picture his father was taken ill, and he finished the picture witbout a central model. While his father was on his dying bed with the comedy picture in his hand, he saw his mistake in attempting to paint this grand old man as such a trivial character. He pictured his father as a heroic drummer leading the Revolutionist Army into action. It was an inspiration, and he followed that inspiration by the evolved picture, "The Spirit of '76," which made Willard's reputation as an artist, one of the foremost of the land.

This picture takes the place of "Loyal Hearts," which was advertised in our last issue.

MIATT PATENTS

HAVE YOU BEEN CARTOONED?

The motion picture cartoons appearing exclusively in the Gaumont Weekly have been a strong hit. "The Situation in New York," exemplified by Leonard, the cartoonist, in Gaumont Weekly No. 48, tells of New York's present municipal upheaval more completely and more interestingly than would be possible in columns of type.

A renegade official is shown making off with two bags of money. A change of a few lines shows the officials in entirely different positions, with the hand of District Attorney Whitman clutching them by the coat collar.

The motion picture cartoon has come to stay. It is one of the most pleasing of innovations.

OPERATORS' CHAT

By Ralph Knaster

MOVING PICTURE MACHINE OPERATORS' UNION OF GREATER NEW YORK, INC.,

LOCAL No. 1

President—Robert Goldblatt.
Vice-President—James Daisie.
Secretary-Treasurer—Robert Levy.
Recording Secretary—George Epstein.
Sergeant-at-Arms—Ed. Spinola.
Business Representative—Ralph Knaster.

Telephone—Stuyvesant 572.
Office—133 Third Avenue.

The article which appeared in the Chat of last week's issue about the strikebreaker, one Dick De Costa, who is now president of the so-called branch or moving picture department of Local No. 35. You have noted that the article would be continued in this issue, and you will learn a little more about this would-be conscientious "union man." You have been told how this man was the cause of breaking the Fox strike, which, according to the central body, or the C. F. U. of New York, is not settled to this very day and all houses on the circuit are on the unfair list.

You have read in this paper how Dick De Costa helped to starve out the union men of the I. A. T. S. E. and worked against the will of the Musicians' Union of the A. F. of L., whose cause we, the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union, had taken up and walked out in sympathy with them.

Now you will learn just a little more about this strikebreaker, Dick De Costa, president of the moving picture department or branch of Local No. 35. About eight years ago the "International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers" went on strike in New York City to better their conditions, and this strike lasted about two years. Dick De Costa, of strikebreaking fame, was at that time a member of that organization, and at that time perjured himself by not living up to his oath of obligation, and started a genuine scab organization which was backed up by various contractors in the electrical line, who were the bosses against whom the I. B. E. W. were striking for better conditions. Dick De Costa was also a member of the ex-Auxiliary of Local No. 35, I. A. T. S. E., but members of the ex-Auxiliary did not know of his career at that time, until one afternoon at a meeting of Local No. 35 which was attended by Robert Goldblatt and also De Costa, and at that particular meeting a member arose to explain the situation. The man who gave the explanation was also a member of the I. B. E. W. as well as a member of Local No. 35, and the story he told of the strike was heartrending and would break down a man with iron nerves. At the conclusion of that pitiful story the man pointed his finger at Dick De Costa and stated "That there's the wretch of a man who was the fault of that critical situation of the I. B. E. W."

It was then left to Local No. 35 to investigate same, but, unfortunately, as always with other matters, it neglected to do so until Robt. Goldblatt had made inquiries as an officer of the Auxiliary into the situation. All accusations against Dick De Costa were verified before the Executive Board of the I. B. E. W. in the presence of Robt. Goldblatt, who took the occasion to appear before that body, and there at that meeting it was learned that the story which was told before Local No. 35 was only half told, and that the career of De Costa was blacker than print could show, also that he was indebted to theI. B. E. W. about $114 for dues, assessments and various fines. When this strikebreaker learned of the information which Robt. Goldblatt had received regarding what kind of a union man he was, De Costa quickly resigned from the Auxiliary to avoid being thrown out with violence. It is a question, from the character of De Costa, whether this money held by him was ever turned into the treasury of I. B. E. W.

At the time of the Fox strike De Costa wanted to join the Auxiliary again, and the proposition was placed before Mr. Stevens, who was president of Local No. 35 and chairman of the Auxiliary. Mr. Stevens said to Sam Kaplan, who was vice-president at that time, that the proposition could not be entertained, and whosoever would entertain it, charges would be preferred against the men. Now this very man who was barred from the union has been taken into the ranks of Local No. 35, into their department, and furthermore, so honored that he holds an executive position. More disgrace to Local No. 35. It seems from all indications that the old saying, "Birds of a feather flock together," is true in more than one sense when so-called "union" (?) men as the "Branch" (?) have elected to be guided by such a first-class rascal as De Costa has shown himself to be.

* * * * * * *

For the benefit of those readers of the Chat who, perhaps, may not have received or read a copy of the appended letter, I beg you to kindly peruse same and grant the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1, your most favorable consideration in our fight for right and justice.

TO ALL LOCALS OF MOVING PICTURE OPERATORS OF THE INTERNATIONAL ALLIANCE THEATRICAL STAGE EMPLOYEES OF U. S. AND CANADA.

Dear Sirs and Brothers:

I respectfully lay before you my opinion as a moving picture operator and the business representative of the Moving Picture Machine Operators' Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1, in regard to the coming convention to take place at Seattle, Washington, this summer, at which you, my honorable brothers or delegates, will investigate the misrule of Local No. 35, I. A. T. S. E., toward their former Auxiliary, a body of 500 men, now an organization protected under a state charter, waiting for you to assist us in our efforts for justice and to a direct charter of the I. A. T. S. E. of U. S. and Canada.

I believe the moving picture operators are better off for the absence of such men as the spot light workers of Local No. 35 from the motion picture industry, inasmuch that they do not understand such projection and are not required to be licensed by city or Federal authorities, and further, that they are holding a charter which calls for more than one profession, contrary to rulings of the American Federation of Labor, and are a detrimental organ to the moving picture industry, where so much life, limb and property is at stake, for spot lamp workers do not have to undergo the examination of a moving picture operator, whose task is more difficult and responsible, owing to the highly inflammable material they must handle and therefore are more superior craftsmen than the spot lamp operators.

I congratulate you, brothers, in advance on your efforts to bring out the facts and I urge you furthermore to the most drastic investigation of the system which was in force, also the tactics and procedure when we were an auxiliary to Local No. 35, I. A. T. S. E.

I assure you that the members of my organization will feel very much relieved and will greatly rejoice if the work of the delegates at the convention of the I. A. T. S. E., which will be held in Seattle, shall emphasize the facts; two distinct trades, such as spot light workers, can not be controlled in a charter which gives them the right to operate moving picture machines, or, in other words, two different crafts covered by one charter.

It is our opinion if this sort of charter rights can prevail or continue to exist then the bill posters will have to be an auxiliary to the paper hangers' union, for they carry a pail of paste, brush, smoother-down brush, the same material as the paper hanger, and the harness-makers will have to be an auxiliary to the shoe makers' union because they handle leather and other material in that trade.

Assuring you of our confidence in your intentions and in that of the delegates that will attend at the next I. A. T. S. E. convention and trusting that the results of your work will be of such a character as to eliminate the monopolizing and combining of various trades under one charter as now exists, now and in future.

I am yours fraternally.

RALPH J. KNASTER,
Business Representative,
M. P. M. O. Union of Greater New York, Local No. 1.

* * * * * * *

Many readers of this column have approached me and mentioned at different times, and asked me why other organizations who may have matters of interest are not presented to the readers. I wish to state that the columns of the Moving Picture News are open to any labor organization in the trade that may have items of interest or discussions to present. So now, you union men, wake up and let the readers of the Moving Picture News hear from you and know that you are in existence.

RALPH J. KNASTER,
Business Representative,
M. P. M. O. U. of Greater New York, Local No. 1.

15 EAST 26th STREET NEW YORK, N. Y.

Jack Kerrigan, that popular leading man of the American Film Mfg. Company, is now enjoying the more or less novel sensation of seeing himself in "store" clothes. Jack, in the two years he has played "leads" for the American, has been seen almost always in chaps and an open shirt. Apparently, now that he is starring in "dress-up" parts, Kerrigan has added a new train of admirers, judging from the sudden increase of his always heavy mail. Jack is quite as delighted as his many friends as it has given him an opportunity to demonstrate his versatility.

Hallberg Ships A. C. to D. C. Equipment to China

Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," has just made a shipment of one of his A. C. to D. C. outfits to the Arcade Amusement Company, Tientsin, China. Mr. Hallberg also reports the sale of one 110-volt D. C. economizer to L. Sablosky, Norristown, Pa., and also one 110-volt D. C. economizer to J. J. Sheehan, Waterbury, Conn. G. A. Stoney, Bennettsville, S. C., purchased through Mr. Hallberg a Power's No. 6A, 200 opera chairs and a full line of supplies.

Release March 17, 1913, "WHEN A WOMAN WON'T"
A Really Laughable Farce with an unexpected twist at the end. Backed by splendid photography and superb California settings. You will surely like it.

Release March 20, 1913, "THE LESSON"
A simple story with a simple moral—not a problem play but a tale wide as the world in its appeal. Well enacted and beautifully photographed. Some really astonishing camera work.

Release March 22, 1913, "AN EASTERN FLOWER"
Remarkably strong situations. A Kerrigan and Bush picture—quite enough said for lovers of good pictures. A subject of excellent dramatic value and literary judgment. One and three sheets with this subject.

THREE CALIFORNIA-MADE PICTURES EACH WEEK
Dramas with a punch—comedies that deserve the name—photography clear, stereoscopic that only a California Sun can make—You know the kind! Quite the peer in Pantomimic Expression—without doubt the highest trained, highest paid, cleanest-cut stock companies on the Pacific Coast. "DEMAND AMERICANS."

RELEASE OF MARCH 13th

LINCOLN for the DEFENSE

TO THE TRADE:-

This historical story will probably be well remembered by the public. It deals with an incident in Mr. Lincoln's career where he left a very important political meeting at Springfield to go across country to defend a poor farmer boy who is on trial for murder. We were fortunate in finding Mr. Day, who has made a very life like Lincoln, and with the untiring efforts of our Director, Mr. Vale, we are able to present to you a very excellent picture for this release. I am confident that it is going to be very well received everywhere. We have prepared some very strong paper, one-sheets and three-sheets.

TWO-REEL SUBJECT. Our release of MARCH 20TH, is a two-reel subject, entitled "TILL DEATH US DO PART". This is the first two-reel subject we have prepared. I consider it the best picture we have made up to date, and strongly recommend to you.

I am pleased to announce that the Pilot Company is now making a wonderful wild animal picture. Contrary to the current vogue, however, it will be a comedy.

CINEMATOGRAPHY AND RELIGION

THE question of a man's religion is one that affects each person individually, and upon him or her alone depends the explanation and application of that religion. A man may belong to all the religions or none. He may hold in reverence the Divine Principle within himself and worship that as his Christ or the God, and no man has a right to say him yea or nay or controvert the knowledge that he has acquired; therefore for manufacturers to bring out films that are a travesty upon any man's religion or any of the religious systems of to-day is a crime against the Divine Father of us all.

I have seen films made by Hebrews ridiculing and holding up to scorn the sacred religion of the Catholic, and making a priest do things in the film that are absolutely false to his nature or to the Church to which he belongs. I have seen films brought out by other manufacturers showing the Hebrew in the worst possible light he can be found, thus bringing together the two extremes of badness and not giving credit for the great good there is in each as citizens of the world. Again, films have shown curates and clergymen of the Episcopalian Church in scenes against which their whole nature revolts. Why bring in religion at all?

There was recently placed on the market a film supposed to be an exposé of Spiritualism. Now, the very essence of all religions is Spiritualism, the faith in the Unseen Powers of Good. From India comes the source of religion such as we know to-day, the origin of the Aryan race, and if picture makers would only study the ancient world wisdom religion their minds would be broader, and they would not produce such incongruous pictures as sometimes are seen on the screen of the people's playhouse. This picture to which I refer is supposed to be taken from the tricks of Spiritualists. There are tricks in every trade and in every religion, but, apart from the tricks, great truths underlie the whole. I have been a student of Spiritualism, Psychology and the Higher Criticisms for a period of perhaps twenty-five years. In the researches of the Psychic Research Society of London I was at one time an investigator with the late William T. Stead, and here in America with the late Isaac K. Funk, and the trouble was to sift the truth from the false, and such tricks as are exhibited in the film of the "Exposé of Spiritualism" are the crudest attempts at legerdemain ever exhibited to a gullible public. These tricks can be seen at the Egyptian Hall, London, and by many jugglers of the stage in America, but these tricks are not Spiritualism. I have examined in my day hundreds of so-called spirit photographs and have yet to see one which, as a photographer, I cannot duplicate.

I have been in materializing seances and have left in sorrow to think that so many people will be gulled by such tricks. I have been in circles where everything was of the highest and the purest philosophy, and not one present left that meeting or meetings without feeling that they had come in contact with unseen realms, and great good had come to them by such contact. I have been in meeting houses where the Divine Spirit affected the people to such an extent that they acknowledged "it was good to be there," and the spirit of the Great Father moved over the populace, and my philosophy teaches me to honor the religion of all and every man; not belittle or decry his faith. If it is good to him to belong to any denomination of the various sects in existence to-day, and if he can get a little courage and enjoyment in this life therefrom, by all means let him have it, so that it may rule his conduct in his business experience; and if it makes him more honest and more broad-minded to the feelings of his fellow men, that religion has done him an immense amount of good and brought him near to the portals of his inner consciousness. Therefore I want to raise a warning note for exhibitors all over the country, wherever pictures are handed out to them that travesty Spiritualism or any other "ism," that they reject them at once, and refuse under any conditions or circumstances to let such a film be shown in their house, and if manufacturers could only be taught that the people are adverse to any such exhibitions they will spend their money in future for that which will help and not ridicule true manhood and womanhood.

MOTION PICTURE EXHBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

An Important and Interesting Communication from President Neff on the Censorship Question

To the Motion Picture Exhibitors:

I desire to make a public statement to you of the conditions existing at the present time. First, I wish to congratulate all the members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America on the splendid organization and grand showing we have made since our Chicago convention. We now have thirty-five states which are affiliated with our organization. The league is in a prosperous condition and new states are being organized and new members are joining our locals and our state organizations very rapidly. The indications now are that there will be very few states, indeed, outside of our organization when the big convention assembles on the 7th of July in the Grand Palace in New York City. Our convention in New York will undoubtedly surpass all other efforts and establish a record for attendance. Letters of inquiry are daily being received at my office about the New York convention. Great preparations are being made throughout the United States and Canada to attend the convention; special trains and special delegations from the various states. In fact, the country is lit up all over with the anticipation of the splendid entertainments, instructive and educational features of the convention and the Congress of Arts.

Leaving the convention, we now turn to the subject which seems to be agitating the exhibitors, manufacturers, film exchanges and all others connected in our line of business throughout the country, namely, the censoring of pictures. Right here I desire to make a frank, plain statement of facts in regard to the censor bill proposed in the State of Ohio at the state convention held in Toledo, O., on the 16th and 17th of July, 1912. It was apparent at that time that in the near future a constitutional amendment would be passed in the State of Ohio giving to each municipality the legal right to home rule. At the Toledo convention a resolution was unanimously indorsed by Ohio exhibitors that Ohio favor a state censor board. Governor Cox, then a candidate for governor, spoke at the convention and indorsed the resolution. There was nothing said or done in regard to the censor bill until we met in national convention at Chicago on the 13th of August, 1912. Previous to our Chicago convention I extended an invitation to the National Censor Board and their officers to meet with us in Chicago to devise a plan whereby we might create a legally constituted national censor board By a resolution in our convention in Chicago I was authorized to appoint a committee to meet the representative who had come from New York to Chicago to discuss the censoring of motion pictures. The committee was appointed by myself, but before they conferred with him, they found that he had returned to New York, and a little later there appeared in the papers articles favoring a meeting in Baltimore to organize a league. At that time the press mentioned the fact, but discouraged it, especially the New York press. Nothing came of it.

The local exhibitors of southern Ohio held a meeting at the Cincinnati Zoölogical Gardens on the 5th of October, and Hon. J. M. Cox, together with other distinguished speakers, favored the state censor board, and the exhibitors of Ohio again went on record as favoring a state censor board.

About three months ago I wrote letters to the presidents of the General Film Company, the Universal Film Company and the Mutual Film Company, asking their advice as to a censor board. I gave them my views freely on the censor board question and outlined a plan of the bill for the State of Ohio. I heard from the president of the General Film Company, and from his letter I was under the impression that he favored a state censor board for Ohio, but he was exceedingly doubtful if we could secure one. Up to the present time I have not heard from the other manufacturers.

Some time ago I was in the State of New York, in company with Mr. Sam Trigger, state president of the New York League. We visited the headquarters of the People's Institute, also the headquarters of the National Board of Censorship, located at No. 50 Madison avenue, New York City. In a conversation with Mr. John Collier, educational secretary, I discovered that they were all at sea as to a plan whereby a legal national censor board could be established. After discussing the matter with them, I came to the positive conclusion that we could get no relief from the National Censor Board of New York or the People's Institute, by reason of the fact that the public, and especially the police power of each state and municipality, had discovered that the National Censorship Board was self-constituted, with no authority whatsoever, and was formally established for the purpose of soothing or pacifying those who are ever ready to condemn and find fault or disturb, by reason of their fanatic disposition and keen appreciation of other people's business.

Before writing the present censor bill of Ohio I communicated by letter with Mr. John Collier and asked for suggestions and if he could give me anything tangible whereby we might work out a satisfactory plan for censoring pictures in Ohio. He wrote back on the 26th of December, 1912, that "they had done nothing in the matter." I wrote him again, and on the 2nd of January, 1913, he wrote again, stating that I "put a knotty problem up to them," but he suggested nothing along the lines of censorship that would help the condition in Ohio. I invited Mr. Collier or any committee they cared to send to our Columbus convention on the 21st, 22nd and 23rd of January, 1913, and no one came to confer with us from the National Board of Censorship.

In September I consulted our national attorney, ex-Senator Foraker, in regard to a national censor board, hoping that we would receive relief through the Congress of the United States by legally constituting a censor board that would be effective throughout the country. The following letter is an exact copy of Senator Foraker's communication to me, dated September 18, 1912:

"M. A. Neff, President,
"Cincinnati, Ohio.

"Dear Sir: Without stopping to examine authorities or taking the trouble to write you a formal legal opinion, but answering your question informally, as you have requested me to do, the local authorities of the states and municipalities have an undoubted right in the exercise of the police power to establish a censorship of such character as they may deem necessary with respect to the exhibition of moving pictures, and I do not know of any power conferred by the Constitution of the United States under which the Congress or the Federal authorities could exercise a censorship or surveillance with respect to the mere exhibition of moving pictures. The transaction is not in the nature of interstate commerce, but only a local transaction that falls entirely within the authority of local officials. Very truly yours,

(Signed) "J. B. FORAKER."

After receiving this information, in my humble way I tried honestly and earnestly to protect the motion picture industry and all engaged therein. I wrote the folfowing bill, which is now before the legislature of Ohio, and we have every reason to believe that it will pass and become a law. This censor bill was read twice before the state convention held at Columbus on the 21st and 22nd of January, 1913, and was unanimously approved. It has been read the first time in the House and now is before the Judiciary Committee, and we hope will be reported out favorably within a day or two, as every exhibitor that I know in the State of Ohio at this date is in favor of the censor bill.

Before presenting this bill to the legislature or to our convention I was very careful and solicitous as to the legal standing contained in sections 6 and 7 of the bill. Section 6 reads as follows: "By a majority vote of the State Censor Board hereby created, such board may work in conjunction with any other censor board or boards of other states as a censor congress, and the action of said congress in approving or rejecting films shall be considered as the action of the board hereby created, and such action shall be so designated, and, when passed, approved, stamped and consecutively numbered by said congress and the fees paid to the Ohio State Censor Board as provided for herein, shall have the same force and effect as if approved by the board hereby created in separate session." Section 7 reads as follows: "When films have been passed and approved by the Ohio State Censor Board or the Censor Congress and stamped and numbered by said board or congress, as provided for herein, they may be shown and exhibited within the State of Ohio, without restriction or interference, any other ordinances or regulations to the contrary notwithstanding."

The following letter received from Senator Foraker reads as follows, dated February 3, 1913:

"M. A. Neff, President,
"The M. P. E. L. of America,
"Cincinnati, Ohio.

"Dear Sir: I herewith return the draft of a bill providing for the board to censor motion picture films and prescribing the duties and powers of the same.

"I have made but a few slight changes. In the form so indicated, the bill will be constitutional, and in every way, so far as I can see, be effective to accomplish the purpose you have in view.

"Very truly yours,
(Signed) "J. B. FORAKER."

This letter from Senator Foraker shows that the Ohio Board of Censors may work in conjunction with one or more states and establish a constitutional legal censor board, whereas, if other states desire, they may have their pictures censored free of charge. All that other states would have to do is to pass a law accepting all pictures censored by the national congress of censors. Now let us see what this means. If two or more states pass a censor bill the same as Ohio will pass, and will co-operate with the Ohio State Censor Board and establish a censor congress, they can legally censor all the films for all the states free of charge. It is our intention and purpose, after we have tried our Ohio state plan of censoring, to raise only a sufficient amount of money to pay the salaries and expenses of our state censor board, whether they work alone or with other states.

I wish to convey this idea to the exhibitors throughout the country. A censor congress established for two or five states can do the work for all the states, and the states that pass a law indorsing the censor congress will not have to pay one cent for censoring pictures that are used in their state. A congress so established will be legal and will be paid a salary and will be under the jurisdiction and control of the law, and when a picture is censored by this congress it can and will be shown in every municipality throughout the United States, the state concurring, without the consent of municipalities.

The National Censor Board as now organized cannot legally be indorsed by any state, as it has no legal standing in the State of New York. The National Board of Censors of New York is financed by public donation, and that the exhibitors and others interested my know who contributed, here are the names of the contributors: In 1912, J. J. Kennedy, on behalf of the licensed manufacturers, contributed $9,000; the M. P. Distributing & Sales Company, on behalf of the independent manufacturers, contributed $900; civic societies of Wisconsin, etc., $148.80; individuals, $38; rebate from New York Telephone Company, $11.21, making a total receipt of $10,098.01. This report is made by V. Everet Macy, treasurer of the People's Institute. These names are given to inform the public and also some of the exhibitors, who probably do not understand the situation. A few more of those who constitute the National Board of Censors are Lyman Abbott, Andrew Carnegie, Andrew Edison, Samuel Gompers, William Ives, Miss Hildegarde M. Babbitt, Mrs. Sarah C. Clapp and many other distinguished persons.

I wish to say I believe that the National Censor Board has done good work and has accomplished much good, but the time has arrived when the public understand that the National Censor Board is composed of civic societies and has no legal authority. Naturally, the people are not impressed when they see the sign on the curtain that a certain picture has been passed by the National Board of Censorship. And they also know the police power was invoked before the picture could be shown. Every active member of this board deserves great credit for their untiring efforts in assisting to bring about better conditions and to uplift the business, but owing to the great progress made in the moving picture industry and the many demands on the exhibitors, manufacturers and film exchanges and others, it becomes absolutely necessary to proceed along legal, safe business lines.

In a short time in the State of Ohio, we will have home rule, giving the legal right to every municipality in the state to exercise their police power without interference. We have attached to our Censor Bill an emergency clause which is absolutely necessary to legalize the bill and put the censor board in effect and operation before home rule takes effect in the State of Ohio. If we should fail to do this, millions of dollars that are now invested in the State of Ohio through arbitrary methods and municipal censor boards of which we now have a sample in Cleveland, Ohio, every film exchange and every exhibitor that does business in our state would lose financially. In my opinion, after the Censor Bill becomes a law, its efficiency will be thoroughly established and not only the exhibitors but everyone connected with our line of business will be more than pleased with the result.

I would ask the exhibitors throughout the country to go slow, unless you are confronted by similar conditions that we have in Ohio, and if you are, move quickly, if there is no urgent necessity, do not endorse any censor board or pass a state censorship law until the Ohio State Censor Board has been thoroughly tried out.

I wish to say further, Ex-President Taft in his decision in the District of Columbia did not say that censoring was unconstitutional, but stated that he did not wish to interfere with the police power of the district. That is just what will happen in the State of Ohio if we do not have a State Censor Board! The police power in each municipality will establish a legal censor board which no one can interfere with and it would be unconstitutional to try to do so.

Therefore, there is nothing possible for us in Ohio to do for protection but to pass a State Censor Bill as quickly as possible and then co-operate through a national censor congress.

MOTION PICTURE EXHIBITORS' LEAGUE OF AMERICA

Cincinnati Local Branch No. 2 6f The Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America, held their annual meeting at the Sinton Hotel, in February, and elected the following officers: A. C. Dingelstedt, president; G. W. Hill, first vice-president; Chas. Sternberger, second vice-president; Harry Heimerdinger, secretary; Otto Luedeking, treasurer.

At a big banquet given on Tuesday, March 4th, at the Sinton Hotel, the officers were installed. The big banquet hall was crowded; everybody enjoyed themselves. The programme arranged by Messrs. Luedeking, Kitt and Botts was enthusiastically endorsed, as a grand success. An orchestra enlivened the occasion. M. A. Neff, president of the national organization, installed the officers with the following ceremony, each officer being escorted and standing at his assigned position that he assumes in the local, after a notary public, Lem S. Miller, had sworn them into office, they were given the following injunctions:

Mr. Dingelstedt, you are placed at the head of the table, as it now becomes your duty to lead in all things pertaining to Cincinnati Local No. 2. You have been chosen by your brother exhibitors as worthy and qualified to fill this position of honor. We hope and trust that your administration will be as successful as your predecessor's. We all join in wishing you a harmonious and prosperous year as president of Cincinnati Local No. 2. Mr. Heimerdinger, your position is at the right of the president, as you are the one upon whom will depend that all notices and business pertaining to the league shall be efficiently attended to, and as your duties are second to the President, you are placed upon his right hand. Mr. Luedeking, your duties as Treasurer are very important, as the League will look to you for the safeguarding of the funds and to jealously guard the same. Mr. Hill, you are placed at the right hand of the Secretary, where you will be enabled to observe and hear all that is transpiring in the League; that in case of the absence of the President, that you may efficiently fill the position of President. Mr. Sternberger, you are placed at the left of the Treasurer, where you may closely observe all of the transactions and assist in the work of the League. In case of the absence of the President and First Vice President your duty will be to assume that higher office and perform the duties of the same. Mr. Schottmiller, your position is at or near the door to see that none enter our Local executive meetings only members or invited guests, and it is your duty to see that the President"s orders are carried out in preserving order."

After the installation of officers, a hearty handshake was given the officers by every member of the League and three cheers were given for Cincinnati Local No. 2 who endorsed the State and National League in all their actions and stand ready to respond to every call.

Several out-of-town exhibitors were present at the banquet held, although it was a local affair: John Broomhall, Hamilton, State Secretary, O. B. Weaver, Dayton, State Vice President; Orene Parker, National Vice President, from Kentucky, and ten of the K. & C. Local from Covington, Kentucky, came across and enlivened the banquet.

Every exhibitor present endorsed the action of the national conference and will only be too glad to contribute 5 per cent. to the State of Ohio and 5 per cent. to the National League of their gross receipts on April the 8th. The Local also gave President Neff a vote of thanks for his untiring efforts in building Local No. 2, and unanimously pledged their support, and desired that all exhibitors throughout the country may know that they appreciate his efficiency and honesty in securing better conditions for all exhibitors.

When the banquet adjourned there were fifty-six (56) members of Cincinnati Local No. 2 more than pleased, all working together in harmony for the uplift of the business, and the twenty-five visiting friends of the Local went away feeling that Cincinnati Local Exhibitors are a solid, progressive body of business men. A picture was taken of the banquet.

It was generally remarked that there has never been over three pictures run by a member of the Cincinnati Local, and where it is possible, only two pictures are run.

Alabama will hold a big convention on the 24th of March; A. A. Wall of Birmingham, Alabama will have full charge of the convention, and is now opening up an office in Alabama, and has secured the services of a stenographer. He confidently expects to have the biggest convention yet held in the South. Mr. Wall is a thorough business man and a bona-fide motion picture exhibitor and is co-operating with Mr. Neff in organizing Alabama thoroughly.

Every exhibitor in the State of Ohio is now in favor of the Ohio State Censor Bill, as it has been thoroughly explained to them; all working in harmony. It will be decided this week whether the new theatre to cost $250,000, seating 3,000, will be built at the corner of Seventh and Vine streets. Cincinnati. There has been considerable talk about this new theatre, and as yet it has not been permanently decided.

The Cincinnati theatres are doing a splendid business. The League is taking in new members almost daily and confidently expects every theatre that is eligible to join the League in the near future.

Cleveland, O., March 4, 1913.

Editor Moving Picture News,

Dear Sir:—I desire to comment on the Ohio State Censor Board Bill, following my previous letter in your journal.

On February 26th we had a conference of prominent exhibitors of this state at Columbus, and this matter was thoroughly discussed pro and con. The bill, as proposed, was taken up in detail and several important changes were made, especially that of charging a dollar on old reels, this being reduced to 25 cents per reel. Other changes were also made in the bill.

The motive for presenting this bill in this state was made more clear to my mind, and, after listening to the arguments of exhibitors from Cincinnati, Columbus, Toledo and other points, wherein they stated that their municipalities have been asked to hold in abeyance proposed city ordinances for local censor boards, and, after taking into consideration that Ohio has recently gained the privilege of coming under "home rule" (giving all municipalities the right to enact their own laws governing their own cities), I have come to the conclusion that, if we can get a censor board that will have jurisdiction over the entire state, doing away with petty boards such as are proposed in many towns, it would be the better plan. In this way, the enactment of this Censor Board Bill will supersede the enactment of home rule, and so it will be impossible for the municipalities to create any other censor boards in their home towns.

Further, inasmuch as no lawyers were able to devise means whereby the present National Censor Board could become legalized in this state, my contention was a hopeless one, and I now feel that this Censor Board Bill, as approved, is the best way out of the difficulties which beset us.

I also wish to call the attention of the other states to the fact that I am advised the United States Government would be unable to enact a law creating a National Censor Board that would be legal in the states outside of the District of Columbia. I am further advised that the present National Censor Board has no legal standing even in its own state, that of New York, being simply a self-constituted board of censors.

This proposed Ohio censor board bill has a provision in it for a National Congress of Censors, and if this bill becomes a law in Ohio, and the other states should legalize this Ohio censor board in their own states, it can in this way become a legal national censor board, with headquarters for such a board at such a place as may be selected. Such a congress would minimize the expense to manufacturers and the film business in general.

So, if there are any proposed state or city censor boards in other states, I would advise the members of our league to try to hold such proposed measures in abeyance until we have passed an Ohio law creating this censor board. In this way only can we secure harmony of interests and really benefit all concerned.

The bill has been gotten up with the desire to be of benefit to the exhibitors and the entire industry, and my earnest hope is that the Governor will appoint to this board substantial business men who are familiar with the film business, and therefore capable of censoring films when this bill becomes a law.

Yours truly,

C. M. CHRISTENSON,

National Secretary of The Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America.

HOW "THE SPIRIT OF '76" WAS PAINTED

Release of March 13th

Willard, on his return from the war is welcomed by his old employer, Amos Tripp, a wagon builder of Wellington, Ohio. Willard at once starts in to follow his old line of work, painting wagons. While painting a wagon one day the idea occurs to him, and he immediately starts to paint a landscape view on the side of a wagon. Wagons with small paintings on them immediately become very popular, and are sold as fast as Willard can paint them. Tripp's little daughter, one day, showed Willard a sketch from which he conceived the idea of painting his famous picture called "Pluck." This picture becomes very popular in Cleveland, and thousands of copies were sold by Ryder, an art dealer. Willard receives a request to paint a picture for the Philadelphia Centennial. One day in his shop he has his father and two other fellows pose for him, and painted what was known as "The Fourth of July Musicians." Shortly after this, his father dies, and Willard feels that he does not like to see his father in a comedy sketch. He thinks and thinks over the matter, and finally pictures in his mind his father as a heroic drummer, leading the army into action. Following this inspiration, Willard painted the famous picture "The Spirit of '76."

NEW THEATRE AT SPRING LAKE, N. J.

Mr. Otto Morris, of Spring Lake, N. J., is building a new $20,000 motion picture theatre at the above place. Everything in the building will be first class and through Mr. J. H. Hallberg, "The Economizer Man," order has been placed for Power's No. 6A M. P. Machine, A. C. Current Saver Curtain, and a full line of supplies. Callahan & Bisner, of Park Ridge, N. J., have also purchased from Mr. Hallberg an Edison Model B Machine which they will use for a traveling motion picture show in the smaller towns in New Jersey.

LINCOLN FOR THE DEFENSE

Pilot Release of March 13th

This picture play illustrates an episode in President Lincoln's life prior to his election for Congress. It is historically accurate in every particular. It is the day before his final address to the electors and his success depends upon his final speech, which he has positively promised his political managers to make. A letter arrives from a poor mother whose boy is to be tried for murder, and she begs Lincoln to appear in his defense and save her child. Despite the protestations of his political managers, he determines to chance losing the election, in order to save the child. He tramps to the little courthouse, and in an impassioned plea to the jury tells them how this woman befriended him when he was a poor boy, and how he had held the accused in his arms as a baby, and by appealing forcibly to their paternal feelings, he succeeds in having a verdict brought in of not guilty. The story shows the immortal Lincoln in one of his noblest moments. His self-sacrifice will appeal to all, and this historical fact, while not being well known to the American public, will serve to endear the name of Lincoln more firmly in the hearts of the American people.

GAUMONT WEEKLY ENTERPRISE

The activities of a motion picture weekly of the better class are necessarily worldwide. The director of such a film must know current events wherever they are happening, whether it be a flood in China a typhoon in the Philippines, an earthquake in South America, or the crowning of a king in Europe. The Gaumont Weekly attempts to cover news with pictorial value in every part of the world, and to this end its forty-four camera men outside of the United States are continually moving from place to place on the trail of the live.

"JUST GOSSIP"

By The Mahoney

"Who's Mahoney?"

Watch this column, and you shall learn.

Mahoney has become part of us, or more correctly speaking: "We have become part of Mahoney."

For the moving picture industry has propagated a vast army of Mahoneys in record-breaking time.

They are infinitely more numerous than the Screen Club, if not quite so "classy," for the cost of membership is "nil."

Even distributing companies suffer by comparison, for the Mahoneys outnumber them.

The M. P. O.
The I. A. T. S. E.
The I. B. E. W.
The M. P. E. L.

Are but "units," in numbers, compared to the Mahoneys, for Mahoneys are in evidence everywhere.

The Mahoneys have no secret code. No ritual. No emblem. No handshake except the handshake of fraternity. They fight individually, when alone, and collectively when together.

When the majority are strong in praise, the Mahoneys are unanimous, no matter what the subject may be.

When the majority censure, the Mahoneys are unanimous, no matter what the subject may be.

So there are no disagreements.

Wednesday last was a great day for the Mahoneys.

Weather conditions being uncertain, one of the big chief Mahoneys, in a building which until recently housed several studios, emerged from the doorway and gazed "argus-like" through his binoculars, at the haze, the smoke, and the wavering clouds, then returned, and announced to his "regulars": "We won't work to-day."

So, the "regulars" departed, glad for the holiday, yet exceedingly sorrowful at the loss of emoluments.

They foregathered at their haunt under the shadow of the Bartholdi Inn (where "pickin's" are good) and within a stone's throw of that great mart, the Exchange Building, where fortunes are lost and won by the turn of a "Kadewey."

The redoubtable Carl Laemmle, the Napoleon-like Nestor, of Independent Cinematography, hove in sight.

Though small in stature, his brainy, businesslike presence seemed telepathic in its influence, for the Mahoneys turned, as a man, as the big little man passed.

He courtesied politely, while the Mahoneys doffed their hats, and remarked in unison:

"How d'ye do, Mr. Laemmle!"

And Mr. L. smiled (as only Carl can smile), and passed on, giving no heed to what the Mahoneys remarked afterward.

Joe Brandt was next the cynosure of all eyes, as he stalked by, overcoatless, with hands in his pockets, an expression of absolute contentment on his boyish countenance, as if to say: "I'm glad I'm away from it all, for it was hell!"

Hayes Hunter "came to" after his run-in with the O'Neil and declared to the gathered Mahoneys that the O'Neils were an inferior clan, long before St. Patrick's time, and should have been driven out of Erin, along with the snakes.

And the Mahoneys all agreed that Hayes is the greatest in his class, but neglected to state what class.

Hal Reid, fairly exuding culture, refinement, and great depth of mentality, next breezed by. The Mahoneys' attention wavered for a moment, for they dreaded to look, fearing a stab from his eagle-like eye, for Oh, my! how Hal can look at one, when he is angered. Ask Dave Horsley.

Some said Hal is still with the Universal, but the contradictions were so varied and uncertain, that the true fact remains an unsolved problem.

Fritz Thayer, who says he is one of the important members of the Universal editorial staff, and claims to be responsible for most of their very excellent program, shows his loyalty to that banner, by boldly exposing to gaze the button of that company.

One of the Mahoneys who claims to be on the inside, whose name is withheld for obvious reasons, says: a recent clause in the Universal agreement reads:

Flash.

Any member who disposes of his charter for $280,000, or more, is still at liberty to claim everything in sight, and if sufficiently strong, can hold same, for an indefinite period. But——

Beware if your "Gat" is rusty, and the trigger fails to work at the proper moment, for two carloads of your purchase will be in the wilds of Jersey, before you can say——

Carl Laemmle!

Or rather I should say:

Pat Powers!

Joe Roach ambled by, greeted the Mahoneys with a "cherubic" smile, and remarked:

"Sorry, pals, I'm in a hurry. I'm due to punch the time clock at Pathe Freres in fifteen minutes."

More anon.

PICTURE PLAY WRITERS' DINNER

This interesting meeting of congenial spirits took place at the Taverne Louis, New York City, on Saturday night March 1st. After the good things provided for the occasion had been partaken of, the remainder of the evening was spent in pleasant and beneficial discussion of subjects nearest the heart of the picture play writer.

The main object of the dinner, which is, by-the-way, the second annual affair of the kind to which the New York contingent of the profession, headed by Epes Winthrop Sargent, have invited their fellows, was to establish a friendly circle for the purpose of reviewing for their mutual benefit some of the pictures appearing on the present day moving picture screen.

The first meetings which will be held by the New York scenario writers to which the directors and scenario editors have been also invited to attend will take place on Monday, March 10th, when they will go to the Herald Square Theatre at 7.30, remaining until 9.30. From there they will hie them to a room which will be reserved for them at the Hofbraü for the criticism and general discussion of the merits or dismerits of the pictures which they have seen.

The speakers who responded to the call of Epes Winthrop Sargent who so ably and merrily filled the position of host and chairman of the evening were as follows: Marc Edmund Jones, of Chicago whose rehearsal of the pleasures and benefits derived from the periodical meetings of the little circle of four scenario writers in Chicago was most interesting and inspiring; Hetty Gray Baker, of Hartford, Conn., known in the scenario world as "Brown Betty," whose bright method of attacking the subject proved the feminine capability and right to word in most matters; F. J. Sheedy, of Schenectady, whose interesting remarks were also an inspiration to better things; B. P. Schulberg, of the Famous Players' Company, tendered the regrets of Daniel Frohman, who unfortunately found it impossible to be present; Henry Albert Phillips discoursed on the "Plot of the Short Story" in a most interesting manner; Phil Lang, of the Vitagraph, gave some excellent and friendly advice; W. Stephen Bush spoke with much brilliancy and eloquence creating much merriment on his sly confession of having submitted two scenarios to different manufacturers, receiving promptly a cheque for each, and neither of which he swears has ever been produced; Rev. Boudinot Stockton was also brilliant and cheering; Frank H. Richardson that poor operators are responsible for the large majority of the poor pictures which appear on the screen; and last but not least, Herbert Brenon, director of drama for the Imp Company, expounded his ideas and opinions with the eloquence of a mind convinced.

The evening was a thorough success, as must be the case when such an intelligent, genial crowd of "good fellows meet together." The following is a list of the guests who were present other than those above mentioned:

Miss Cora Drew, of Boston; Dr. R. Ralston Reed and Elmer W. Romine, of Morristown; Steve Talbot, of Philadelphia, E. J. and Arthur Montagne, Herman E. L. Beyer, Newark Town Talk; Stanley E. Todd, Mr. and Mrs. Edmund S. Hirsch, George Hennessey, A. Van Buren Powell, J. E. Kellette, Leon Demachy, Benjamin Barondess, Clarence James Fleming, Hamilton Smith, Robert Daly, Hugh C. Jackson, Miss A. Cowrey, Miss E. Chalmers, John Wylie, Miss Margaret I. MacDonald, of the Moving Picture News; Ben Hur Lease, Louis Reeves Harrison, George and W. E. Blaisdell, Mr. and Mrs. James Hoff, Mrs. Epes W. Sargent.

THE GAUMONT CHRONOPHONE

Editor, Moving Picture News,

Dear Mr. Saunders:

Much publicity has been given lately in the various papers to a certain talking picture machine recently placed before the public, and very broad claims made on behalf of the manufacturer as inventor of talking pictures. I wish to say a few words to the interested public on this matter in order that the public may be properly informed.

I will state, in the first place, that I have no intention whatever in writing this letter of detracting in any way from the reputation of any machine of this type, but simply wish the facts to be properly known. As most of those interested in motion pictures know, there have been several systems of talking pictures placed on the market within the last few years, the first of which was the old Gaumont Chronophone which was exhibited at the World's Fair at St. Louis, consequently it is rather late for any newcomer to lay claim to talking pictures.

The first talking pictures were made by recording first the sound and afterwards the action so that two operations were necessary, and this led to great limitations in the character of the subjects, but as long as five years ago, i.e., 1908, the French Gaumont Company succeeded in making its sound records and films simultaneously. This improvement may be considered a vital factor in the development of the talking motion picture, as without the simultaneous recording of sound and view, the subjects were too limited in character to interest the public.

Since 1908 the Gaumont Company has been working steadily on the problem of increasing the distance at which the sound could be satisfactorily recorded, and two years ago they succeeded in recording the sound at a distance of twenty-five feet. Then they immediately began making a new series of talking pictures, of sketches and plays, some of them a thousand feet long, and they began the public exhibition of these eighteen months ago at the Paris Hippodrome, where they are still being exhibited.

It, therefore, cannot well be denied that they were the first in the field, both at the inception of the idea and in its final development, as exemplified in the talking pictures made by this improved system of simultaneous recording of sound and view called by them the "Filmsparlant." No doubt, the system to which so much publicity has lately been given is based on the same principle; indeed, it must be, if it be good, but it certainly cannot be said that it was the first.

Trusting you will find it possible to give due publicity to this letter, I remain,

Yours very truly,

H. BLACHE,
Vice-President, Gaumont Co.

YOUNG MANAGER OF "RAMO" HAS AMBITIONS

(Interviewed by W. I. MacDonald)

You can usually count on a man with ambitions, especially when his ambitions are backed up by intelligence, education, and high ideals, and judging from first impressions gathered from a brief conversation with Wray Phsyioc, the youthful manager of the Ramo Film Company, the film world is going to gain by his presence and work.

Mr. Physioc was for some time with Pathe Freres as scenic artist and technical director. He also spent some time with the Eclair Company of America in the scenic department. It has occurred very seldom up to date that the manager of a film company has taken his place so well qualified to make a success of the work as has Mr. Physioc. Not only is he conversant with the artistry of stage setting, but he is able to write a scenario, direct it, and manage the camera as well.

The first release of the Ramo Film Company, entitled "The Better Way," was written and staged by Mr. Physioc. In the review of this film which appeared in our last issue, we gave the first effort of the infant concern our hearty endorsement. The intention of Mr. Physioc is to portray characters and conditions which occur in everyday life in as authentic and human a manner as possible. Every film will have a moral of its own, and will be produced artistically, and in a manner which will get at the heart of an audience. This at least is the aim of the company, and with Mr. Physioc's fine sense of the artistic, and the advantages of education which have been his good fortune, he being a graduate of the Washington and Lee University of Virginia, this bids fair to be realized. For although the young man was born in South Carolina, and, by the way, is a direct descendant of Andrew Johnson, a late President of the United States, the most of his early life was spent in Virginia. Wray Physioc, be it known, is a brother of the well-known scenic artist, Joseph A. Physioc, who has been for some time back intrusted with the scenic work of the Henry B. Harris Company.

One a week for the present will be the capacity of the Ramo Film Studio. We may therefore expect good things. One a week insures careful work on the Ramo product.

We extend to Mr. Physioc our hearty congratulations on the merits of what we have seen, and wish him the finest success in the truly great work of picture making which he has undertaken.

ITALA PRODUCES A WONDERFUL FILM OF MUCH VALUE TO THE MEDICAL AND SCIENTIFIC WORLD

At the Film Supply Company a remarkable film was recently shown which depicted the movement of blood through the veins and arteries of the human system.

This film will be of inestimable value to the medical fraternity, and of intense interest and instructive to any one who may witness its production on the screen.

Dr. W. J. Ivory, of the Long Island College Hospital, who saw the film, said that the three methods of blood distribution through the human system—the arterial, the capillary and the venous—could be clearly distinguished.

"The fluctuation of the blood through the arteries could be seen," said Dr. Ivory, "and it was also noticeable that the corpuscles in the center moved more rapidly than those on the outer edge—things that we had known but had never been able to see before.

"The blood lost its impulse as it passed into the capillaries, and from time to time the white corpuscles would 'migrate'; that is, force their way through the walls and spread into the tissues.

"This is a provision of nature for combating poisons in the system, as the white corpuscles are supposed to have the power of overcoming poisonous substances which the system may take in. The blood could also be clearly seen returning to the heart through the veins."

The photography of the picture was so clear that at all times the tissues could be seen expanding and contracting as the subject breathed. This is the first of a series of scientific studies that the Film Supply Company intends to release from time to time, and a number of these films will always be kept on hand for prompt delivery to scientific and professional men.

For Those Who Worry O'er Plots and Plays

The Never Let-Ups

THE old philosopher who put his theory of life in one word which he repeated three times, "Persistence," saw wisely and well. What he advocated in the days of long ago applies with even greater force to these times when modified football tactics have to be used to get anywhere. The writer who "quits" has no show whatever. The fellow with just an ordinary amount of "stick-toitiveness doesn't go far. It is the scribe who is everlastingly on the job who counts. Every day there are instances coming to our notice where the script writer of courage, pluck and persistence "arrives," and the other fellow who could ultimately arrive falls by the wayside. The latter is a "quitter"; the former a "sticker." There is no royal road to success; what you get in this world you earn. We take interest only in the persevering chaps.

You Never Can Tell

Here are some facts which may be interesting to picture playwrights, some of whom seem to believe that the sale of manuscripts and plays is accomplished by chalk-line and spirit level. The best of them make editorial errors. You may have a good piece of work and it may have been refused by every script editor in the business. Keep working to improve that script all the time, and some day it may reach the right editor or director and prove the "great American picture play. But to the trials of others:

The late Charles Major wrote "When Knighthood Was in Flower" and the romance was turned down by every first-class publisher. Disappointed, he resolved to burn it. A friend interfered. A year later he recopied the novel and submitted it to a publishing house. The publisher finally resolved "to take a chance." The history of the novel both as a "best seller" and as a "book-play" is too well known to need extended mention here.

The manuscript of "Everywoman" was kicked around the Shubert offices for a year. Lee Shubert had paid a small advance royalty on it because the author was a newspaperman and his play was brought to Shubert's attention by an influential person. Finally some one urged Shubert to read it. He sent it back to the author, forfeiting the small payment he had made. Colonel Savage took it and made it the most lucrative success of any large-cast play he has produced.

"The Wogglebug" closed after two or three weeks in Chicago. It was strictly a "frost." The scenery and costumes were sold for $1,200. Mark Swan and Anna Caldwell O'Dea looked over the junk and wrote a play to fit it. They called it "The Top O' Th' World." Lee Shubert at the dress rehearsal of the new play asked to have his name taken off the program and booked another attraction for the Majestic Theatre in two weeks. The entire Shubert staff with the exception of Joseph Herbert said the action was impossible. "The Top O' Th' World" stayed seven months in New York, pulled a dead theatre out of debt, and duplicated its success in Chicago.

You never can tell. Maybe you have a good one for the picture screen, universally rejected, that may yet see successful production.

An Experience Meeting

Script writers of the Middle West, who find New York City too far away for banqueting purposes, should dwell together in amity and hold an experience meeting. Cleveland, Ohio, would be an appropriate city for a large number of writers we know of to meet and eat and talk shop. If we can get A. W. Thomas and Ralph D. Stoddard, author, and picture play editor of the Cleveland Sunday Leader interested, as suggested by a scribe, perhaps we can make a joyous occasion. Let other script writers within 300 miles of Cleveland send in their opinions and we will undertake to keep Messrs. Thomas and Stoddard posted. Personally, we promise not to miss it.

The Chicago "Round Table"

This communication from Mr. Marc Edmund Jones, of the Chicago group of picture playwrights, which was suggested by Epes W. Sargent, will prove interesting to others considering a like organization: "I read your letter to our little group and we all felt your suggestions were good ones. We will name our group and adopt a permanent organization in the near future. Our roll numbers four at present: Miss Maibelle Haikes Justice, Mr. C. A. Frambers, Mr. Frank A. Kramer, and the undersigned. In want of a regular organization I have continued to call the meetings and arrange the itinerary. This latter is the matter of looking up the bookings so as to decide what theatres to visit. When there is a recent release of a member's picture we always try to see it in a body and pass criticism. Our wanderings sometimes carry us from one end of the city to the other. We usually meet at some downtown theatre at 6 p.m. every other Tuesday. After taking in the one show we go to some restaurant and have supper together, during which we talk over things, and then we take in several other theatres as arranged for, until it is time to go home. We discuss any matter that anyone brings up. The group is too small really for set papers. The discussion ranges over the best companies to submit to; the kind of stories they want, and how they want them (I got the tip on where several summer sea stories could be placed, could not get anything out in time to submit, but was able to pass the tip on to another member when I learned he was holding two such stories). We criticise the pictures we see, very often will read each other's scenarios to criticise the form, or will even submit an idea to the group to see what they think of it, or where they would suggest it be sent." Certainly an ideal arrangement. Much better than any convention or like plan, because these writers become personally acquainted and each lends his or her best talent to the other, making an organization that is practical and hard to beat. This group idea is attracting much attention, judging from inquiries we receive from many cities. Send in your names and addresses and we will help you organize.

A Late Arrival

The late arrival in the "correspondence school" circles is the Denver, Col., "Bureau." We have their "come-on" letter. It contains that frazzled and doubtful statement of a writer who asserted that three years ago "while working half his time" he made $1,500. The letter asserts that "Literary ability and grammatical perfection are unnecessary. A child with ordinary intelligence can write them." Three dollars is the price for "a complete set of instructions." The "Bureau" works a new advertising plan, using the theatrical pages of Sunday newspapers.

A Flighty Chap

We know an aviator who is writing scripts. He truthfully states that he is up in the air over them a great deal of the time.

This Is the Limit

A reader sends us a page of pasted pictures and wishes our advice as to the poses and gestures to be used in his scripts. We refuse to pose, having lost our hat.

Pertinent Points

If you are ignorant of the Fiji Islands, why cast your script in that environment?

A good working library is a valuable aid to any literary worker.

"Regimental Pals" is a Universal Western produced without a shot, a murder, or a hold-up. They will all be doing it soon.

Even if only a synopsis is requested, do not carry it far over 300 words.

Try and make every word in your script mean something. To appreciate the force and comprehension of the English language is greatly to be desired.

We spend time and thought on naming a cast of characters. Do you?

What we consider the best script we ever turned out, one which necessitated a superficial study of dentistry, we wrote in sixty-five minutes. However, we spent six hours in preliminary work before we sat down to the typewriter.

Do you seclude yourself behind locked doors when writing a script? Why? It's just a habit. We wrote a good script once with three people conversing in the same apartment.

A Traveler and Poet

Richard Willis, of Hollywood, Cal., Western editor of the Universal, has had a varied career. He says he has been a clerk in a jewelry store in Australia, a miner, a poet, writer of fiction, actor, and finally a script editor. He was born in London, England. He got into the motion picture business as an actor, went to the Golden State with a company, wrote a few scripts, liked the work, and since last summer has turned out about fifty working scripts and has rewritten about thirty.

Answer to "Philadelphia"

In reply to "Philadelphia" and several others: Karl Coolidge is editor for the Keystone companies at Edendale, Cal. Richard V. Spencer has charge of scripts for the Kaybee and Broncho companies. Miss Jessie Booth has been engaged as an assistant in the editorial department.

Think Action

The secret of successful script writing is the ability to think in action. This knack can be cultivated. When sitting down to develop your plot, try to forget your mechanical work and to concentrate your mind on the action of your characters. Forget everything but your story. Forget style, diction, word-painting, etc., and when Jane rises to meet John and they embrace, see them do it and tell it. Forget the furnishings of the room, the expression on Jane's countenance, and John's new spring suit. Imagine your pawns are on the moving picture chessboard and concentrate your mind on their logical actions. Visualize, and permit your mind's eye to be all-seeing. If you can do this the technique will often care for itself.

The Wise Attitude

When ignorance is bliss 'tis folly to be wise. However, ignorance is not blissful to the thinking. When an editor takes the trouble to inform you that your script is the usual thing or that it lacks certain essentials, do not become "wise." Do not correct the editor, or write him a scathing letter in which you tell him of your success as a writer, or how the poem you read at the Art Embroidery club meeting, was termed "masterly" in the Daily Howl. He probably will sigh and drop your letter in the waste basket. He will not think you wise, only foolish.

Pardonable Pride

We believe our pride is pardonable. The circulation department informs us that nearly a thousand new readers look forward to this page every week and that they are yearly subscribers coming in since January first. We are glad and heartily welcome them.

Not at All Refining

If certain manufacturers will permit us to say a word, we will immediately rise to remark that there are far too many ex-detectives, cartoonists, former pugilists, former melodramatists, etc., being featured as picture playwrights. These literary lights are conspicuous by their absence from certain film companies. Needless to remark, these self-same companies have a deserved reputation for taste, refinement and uplift in their output.

Stevenson on Brevity

Robert Louis Stevenson was a close student of style and has left more than one interesting discussion of the technique of writing. In a letter to R. A. M. Stevenson, according to Collier's Weekly, he says: "There is but one art—to omit! Oh, if I knew how to omit I would ask no other knowledge! A man who knew how to omit would make an 'Iliad' of a daily paper." To those engaged in script writing we recommend the above few words by Stevenson be committed to memory and put into practice. If you can omit you can write a script synopsis easily in 200 words.

A Clearing House

The Motion Picture Story Magazine announces that it will inaugurate a script clearing house. The details are given in the March number of the magazine. Editor Brewster assures us that only expert writers, and editors of acknowledged reputation and ability will be connected with the venture. A number of our readers have queried us as to the new undertaking and we can inform them that the Motion Picture Story Magazine, through its editor, will do everything promised. We consider Mr. Brewster among the leading magazine editors of to-day inside and outside moving picture circles.

A Serious Misfortune

The many friends of C. B. Hoadley, script editor and author, will regret to learn that his home in Weehawken, N. J., burned to the ground Tuesday night, February 26th. Mr. Hoadley and members of his family had narrow escapes from death. Luckily, all escaped injury. It's mighty tough luck, right in dead of winter, but you cannot keep a good man down.

Not in Market

William A. Corey, well-known script writer of San Francisco, calls our attention to the fact that Gaumont is not in market for scripts. All right, Corey. Thanks; and come again whenever duty calls.

WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT.

THE SCREEN CLUB BALL

The first public function of the Screen Club has been set for Saturday evening, April 19, 1913, when that organization will give its first annual ball at Terrace Garden, Lexington avenue and Fifty-eighth street, New York City. That this event will make history in the social end of motion pictures is already conceded, and it is estimated that fully ten thousand people, members of the club, their friends and admirers, will be on hand to make this, the first Screen Club affair, one worthy of attending.

Under the direction of a most able entertainment committee, preparations are fully under way to uncover some novelties in the way of surprises which will be startling. William Robert Daly and Herbert Brenon are in charge of this committee.

A most unique and probably the most elaborate souvenir which has ever been gotten up for an affair of this kind, is being compiled by Joe Farnham, formerly Gordon Trent the 2nd. This will be a souvenir book containing the portraits of the club members, and the leading lights of the motion picture world, a history of the club from its inception and formation, the literary efforts of the club members, etc., etc. It is to be a handsome volume of more than one hundred pages, beautifully bound in a flexible suede leather cover, embossed with the club crest and in the club colors. It promises to be a work of art, worthy of careful preservation, and a volume that will add to the attractiveness of any library table.

The advertising in this souvenir is also in the hands of Joe Farnham, and he announces that loyal friends of the Screen Club are sending in their copy to him in good style, but there are still some delinquents. Mr. Farnham is to be found at the offices of the Film Supply Company of America, 133-135 West Forty-fourth street, and that address will be the headquarters for the Screen Club ball program committee. mittee.

OLD wine, old books, old friends—but no more ancient plots for moving picture plays! The mandate has gone forth; the portcullis has been hoisted; and the pictureplay editors are now anxiously scanning the horizon of authorship for the strictly original and unusual.

"How many people would you think are writing moving picture plays?" queried a leading pictureplay editor the other evening.

"Maybe ten thousand," I hazarded.

"Make your estimate twenty-five thousand and you'll come nearer the grand total," was the editorial answer.

"About two out of every hundred contributors present original stuff," continued the editor. "We are deluged with stories of the wild and woolly West; impossible stoiries of every description and, worst of all the 'deadly triangle' plot bobs up serenely and in never-diminishing numbers. What is essential to successful pictureplay writing in 1913 is originality and plausibility. We want no old pictureplays revamped, nor do we buy plots similar to those that have been released in the past. The new year will see a new style of pictureplay—stories clean, logical, and above all, containing convincing comedy."

And so, dear picture playwright, "on with the dance and let joy be unconfined"—in Filmland. It tempts us to court the Muse and to Silas Wegg a bit. Listen:

Very few kin do it—th' hardest thing there is—
To fill up yer fountain pen an' git right down to biz.
Jest weaken on excitin' dope, an make th' cowboy save
Th' purty, helpless maiden from th' fiendish Injun Brave!

Not all yu need fer movin' pictures.
Please fergit 'em! All of 'em fixtures!
Blankets, red-paint, fuss 'nd feather,
Gamblers, sheriffs wearin' leather—
No longer go, in th' M. P. show.

Not everyone kin do it—it's really rather hard,
Tu make th' Western miner go a-stealin' from his pard;
While they're pannin' out th' gold way up in th' hills—
An' one sneaks up behind his pal, fires away an' kills!

Not all yu need fer movin' pictures.
Please fergit 'em; they're certain strictures!
Boots 'an buckles, belts an' dirks,
Pistols, bottles, spurs an' quirts—
No longer go, in th' M. P. show.

Everyone is doin' it—all workin' overtime.
Th' lonely little newsboy sells paper fer a dime.
Is sole support of family; takes mazuma home tu ma,
A wealthy stranger follows, and th' newsie finds his pa!

Not all yu need fer movin' pictures.
Please fergit 'em; here's grand, ole mixtures!
Ancient shanty, children cryin',
Slow starvation, mothers dyin'—
No longer go, in th' picture show!

Mary Pickford Moore, as charming a little actress as ever cavorted in moving pictures, awoke Christmas morning to find a Belasco contract in her stocking hanging from the mantlepiece. For more than three years "Little Mary" has been posing in the pictures and has been the heroine of a thousand dramatic episodes. A million people have observed and appreciated "Little Mary's" charm and beauty and exceptional art of pantomime. Sure, you know Mary Pickford Moore. Now, here is the story of how "Little Mary" found fame and fortune sticking in her stocking early Christmas morning.

Mr. David Belasco, quite well known in theatrical circles, is partial to moving pictures. He dropped, one evening, into a moving picture theatre. There he saw Mary Pickford Moore in a Civil War drama in which she enacted a girl of the Confederacy. The playlet gave a varied emotional opportunity to "Little Mary" and she made the best possible use of it. Belasco sat up and took notice. He visited the Biograph studio and came to the very same conclusion to which her thousands of admirers came long ago. The result of Belasco's investigation was a conference; the result of the conference was an understanding; the result of the understanding a contract which came to Mary Pickford Moore just at Christmas time.

And now "Little Mary" is to be nameless to her admirers no more. She is now seen in a Broadway theatre, where she plays the leading part in "The Good Little Devil." Mary Pickford was born in Toronto, Canada, April 8, 1894, and has been in stageland since early childhood. Once she played "Little Eva" in "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

"Why did you go into moving picture work?" she was asked when she was leading lady for the Imp Films Company.

"Why," she echoed, opening her great big blue eyes, "why I needed the money, of course."

"You came from a family of actors, of course?"

"No," she replied, "I am the first member of the family to take up the stage, and I was just catapulted into it. Now my mother, my brother and sister are all in the work and they love it." Owen Moore, the versatile star of the Victor Film Manufacturing Company, is "Little Mary's" husband. They are a devoted couple. Both were affiliated with Giles R. Warren, Victor director, several years ago under Carl Laemmle, of the Imp Films Company.

And so it has come to pass that New York's most astute and artistic dramatic director went to the pictures for a dramatic star. Score another point, please, for moving picture actors and actresses, and, in the meanwhile——

So long, Mary!

Our Hall of Fame

Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal Film Company, was once proprietor of a clothing establishment at Oshkosh, Wis.

Giles R. Warren, former pictureplay editor for Imp, Powers and Lubin Companies, now director of productions for the Victor Film Company, was once a cowpuncher. He is now a member of the Dumont, N. J., fire department.

Neil G. Caward, Photoplay Magazine editor, well remembers when he conducted a moving picture theatre in Minneapolis, Minn.

Eugene V. Brewster, editor of the Motion Picture Story Magazine, made money practicing law in former years.

A. W. Thomas, picture playwright, was once a telegraph operator of an afternoon newspaper.

Some Pertinent Paragraphs

A Detroit man tried to pawn his wooden leg to buy his wife a ticket to a moving picture show and was arrested for disorderly conduct. It seems a small thing to kick about after all.

Henry Arthur Jones asserts that "the one great advantage of the American stage is that you can hear what is being said." Is that always an advantage?

With so many and diverse attractions as the next House of Representatives will offer, the immediate future of the moving picture business in Washington looks discouraging.

What did the populace of the rural community do for entertainment before the advent of the moving pictures? "East Lynne" and "Uncle Tom's Cabin" each came but once yearly.

A Baltimore minister has struck a new chord. He has abolished his quartet choir and is using the money that would be paid them for other purposes. He has actually done it and says it was the best thing that ever happened—that the quartet was only an ornament anyway for only a few persons can distinguish the words they sing. The action of the Baltimore minister can well be emulated by the average moving picture theatre manager. The illustrated songs, many of them, are passe, and not a few of the songsters seemingly have colds or strike the wrong pitch. I know of one moving picture theatre where a majority of the patrons wait until they think the song is over before they enter the portals. Some do not relish the sickly sentimental musical numbers, while others tire of the soloist. Exhibitors should secure high-class, appealing music or do without.

TIGRIS

By VIRGINIA WEST

(Adapted from Itala Release.)

IN the Paris morning papers of October 14, 19——, there appeared the following account:

"Last night, or early this morning, a daring robbery was committed at the establishment of the well-known jeweler and diamond merchant, M. Isaacs. He estimates his loss at $100,000 francs.

"There is no clue whatever, as the robbers left practically no trace beyond an oil spot, apparently from an automobile, in front of the building.

"Detective Roland has the case in hand. We believe he can get results if any man can.

"All Paris is wondering if this is another atrocity of the Tigris gang, or—if there is such a gang? We are putting our faith in M. Roland to find out for us."

Accompanying this short article were pictures of Isaacs, his shop, and Detective Roland.

Among the thousands of the citizens of Paris who were reading this very meagre account of the robbery on that morning of its appearance was Monsieur Lablanc, a wealthy merchant. He sat reading a paper as he waited for his late breakfast.

"What is the news?" asked Lydia, his sister, when she came in with the maid, bringing a part of his breakfast. For Monsieur was very particular and Lydia was always present to see that all was as he wished.

"There seems to have been another robbery. It is very queer that the police can't do something to stop that sort of thing. They make a lot of stir in the beginning, but nothing ever comes of it."

"What are they going to do now?" asked the girl, reaching for the paper.

"They've put Roland on the case. I suppose they think he will do big things."

"Oh, I'm sure he will!" cried Lydia enthusiastically. "Here's his picture! Isn't he splendid looking? All the girls are just wild about him—or about his pictures. I do wish I could meet him."

Lablanc looked up quickly and then became very thoughtful. Finally he said, "Well, I'll try to meet him, little girl, and then I can introduce him to you. Then—then there is no telling what might happen. Isn't that so?" he asked, pinching the girl's cheek.

Lydia laughed and ran from the room and the brother sat down to formulate a plan.

That afternoon Lablanc went to a certain café where he knew that Roland was in the habit of going.

In answer to an inquiry a waiter told him the detective was playing chess, that he had just started the game and would not finish for an hour.

This suited Monsieur Lablanc very well. As he left the café he said to himself, "Lydia wishes to meet Roland, and I shall see that she does."

When her brother proposed a ride in the dogcart fifteen minutes later she readily consented to go.

"Don't drive so fast," suggested Lydia, when they had gone only a short distance.

The brother laughed. "Oh, I'm not driving fast. I'm going to let her out in a moment."

He gave the mare a cut across the back. She dashed forward at double speed.

"Don't! Don't!" pleaded Lydia, but it was too late. The frightened mare dashed against a large plate-glass window and the brother and sister were both thrown to the ground.

The window belonged to the very café in which Roland was playing chess, and he was among the first to go to the rescue. When Lydia opened her eyes the first person they saw was the man who had been so much in her thoughts.

"Thank you, so much," she said when the detective offered to go home with her.

"We are only shaken up a bit," Lablanc insisted, "but we would be most pleased to have you come with us."

So Roland went, and that night, it must be confessed, his new case was not the only thing that occupied his thoughts.

But Roland was a conscientious man, beside the fact that he had a big reputation to sustain. So the thought of the girl he had assisted was permitted only as a spur to success.

One clue and only one he had been able to obtain. The morning after the robbery, when Roland had been called upon to take the case in hand, he had made his usual careful investigation. There was absolutely no clue, excepting, as the papers had stated, an oil spot apparently left by an automobile. A photograph taken of this spot when it was fresh had revealed something of more importance. The wheel of the machine had gone through the oil spot and had left an impression of the tire. This tire was plainly shown to be defective.

Roland was wise enough in the ways of the sort of men he was looking for to know that such a man would not use his own automobile if he had one. Roland reasoned that he would have to have a chauffeur that he could trust, and at the same time one who was apparently the same as any one might encounter anywhere.

So he made his search among the cars which stood in the public places for hire. Disguised as a chauffeur, he was unsuspected and moved among the cars unnoticed.

After long search, but much sooner than he had hoped, he was rewarded. The car with a defective tire on one back wheel, the defect exactly corresponding to the photograph Roland had taken, stood before him.

But he had no proof of what he wanted, only a confirmation of his clue. What was he to do next? Where could he make his clue lead him? That was the question.

Disguising himself as a porter, Roland took up his stand in the vicinity of the car he was watching. There he waited.

In the afternoon he saw the car move out of the crowd and start in his direction. As it passed he jumped onto the back and clung there until the car began to slow up some blocks away.

In a moment a gentleman came along the street and stepped into the car. He was tall, well dressed and distinguished looking, with black hair and moustache.

When the door closed Roland stepped onto his perch at the back of the car. They went for a mile or more and then stopped. Again Roland descended and was the porter looking for whatever might come his way in the shape of a grip to carry.

Out of the car stepped the gentleman, but to Roland's astonishment he wore a slight beard and an entirely different moustache.

He saw Roland, and evidently recognizing him as a man he had seen when he entered the car, he began to walk very rapidly. Roland followed. Faster and faster they went until both were running at top speed. At last he ran into a café and Roland after him. In the crowd Roland lost sight of him for a moment. In searching among the tables he came upon Lablanc sitting alone in a corner.

"Hello, won't you sit down and have something?" called Lablanc.

"No, I'm in a rush," Roland replied. "Did you see a tall man with black moustache and beard and a silk hat?"

"Just now, you mean?"

"Yes. Quick, did you see him?"

"I think I did see someone like that. But I didn't notice particularly. I think he went out the back door."

Roland was away in a minute, but no trace could he find of his prey.

Several days passed and all was quiet. The detective was getting restless. One thing he felt sure of and that was that the man he had followed was a member of the "Tigris" band and that the robbery of Isaacs had been committed by a member or members of that band.

One night shortly after his following the mysterious car, he was awakened by the ringing of his telephone. What he heard when he put the receiver to his ear was this:

"Monsieur Roland? We have positive information concerning Tigris and his band. Meet us at the turn of X—— road at once."

Roland was there in a few minutes. They sprang into the car and were spinning down the road, seemingly toward the country, before Roland asked a question. When he did, as though waiting for that signal the men sprang upon him.

In a flash he realized that he had been given a false message. His telephone wire had been tapped, of course, and the man in the car he took for the Inspector was not he. But he was overpowered now and could do nothing. He was bound hand and foot.

The car stopped near a railroad, and it was but a few minutes until Roland lay across the tracks.

The criminals had calculated the time well, for very soon the detective felt the vibration of the rails and then heard the rumble of the approaching train.

Frantically he struggled to free his hands. Just as the engine was almost upon him he succeeded in slipping his forearms loose. With one supreme effort he threw himself from the rail out onto the middle of the track. As the huge black monster was about to pass over him he gave his body a lunge and managed to seize the buffer of the engine.

Slowly, painfully, he dragged himself up a little way, summoning all his energy to cling to the front of the engine.

Just when he thought he must give up he saw above him two faces. In spite of their blackness they were like two angels to Roland. The fireman and the engineer dragged him to the foot-plate, and there he was able to recover himself and be freed from the ropes.

The next morning all Paris was reading the news of Roland's death. More than one feminine heart was heavy and Lydia was not the only girl with tearful eyes. For the detective had sent a false telegram, thinking that it was as well to let his would-be murderers think their plot had succeeded.

Roland was convinced that the man who was disguised as the Police Inspector the night he almost lost his life was the same man he had followed into the café the first day he had trailed the motorcar. Furthermore, he was very sure that the same man had robbed Isaacs, the jeweler. Now, the point was to find out if this man was Tigris. Roland thought he was, but he could not be sure.

The detective knew that the man must have had a very special reason for being in the particular neighborhood where he alighted from the mysterious car, disguised as he was. Therefore, the first thing he did upon his arrival in Paris was to take up his stand in that vicinity.

This time he chose to be an aged beggar.

His wait was long, but he was rewarded. The very man came past him and crossed to the house across the street. Roland followed, keeping as close to him as he dared. The man rang the bell at the gate and was admitted at once. Roland tried to force his way in, but was kept back by the servant and the gate locked in his face.

A policeman saw him rattling at the gate and took him by the arm. Pulling the beard from his face he revealed himself to the officer, who immediately ran for aid.

The commissioner of police came quickly, with a number of officers in his car. The now badly frightened servant admitted them at once and they were shown upstairs to the study of the wealthy owner of the house, where, a few minutes before, the servants declared they had heard terrible sounds.

The door was found locked. A number of the officers put their weight against it, but it was of heavy oak and would not yield.

Then a quavering voice was heard on the other side of the door and a key turned. To their great astonishment out came the old man.

"Are you hurt, sir?"

"Where is he?"

"What has happened?" was asked in chorus.

"No, no, I am safe. He is there," answered the white-haired man, trembling.

Everyone present swept past him into the room. They heard the heavy door close and turned in time to hear a key in the lock.

"Quick," cried Roland. "He probably has a disguise and will make his escape." In their anxiety to get at the murderer they forgot for a moment the body of the old man lying on the floor behind them.

They were preparing to batter down the door when it opened and they stood facing a frightened servant.

"Oh, sirs," he gasped "I'm afraid he's gone. I saw a gentleman go out who looked just like this gentleman who came in with the officers. I thought I'd come up and see my master and found his gown outside and this door locked with the key on the outside and a great noise inside. Now I see this gentleman who looks like the gentleman who went out."

"Your disguise again," said Roland, turning to the inspector. "Where did he go, my man?" he asked the servant.

"He got into the car at the gate, sir, and was driven away very quickly."

"Just as I expected," muttered Roland to himself the next morning when he learned that a chauffeur had been picked up dead on a lonely road outside Paris.

Roland knew, now, that his man knew he was alive, so he no longer kept under cover. One day he was walking quietly along near the river, thinking over his next step in the case, when suddenly he came face to face with Lydia. The girl was pale, and when she saw Roland she started violently.

"Oh," she exclaimed, "is it really you in flesh and blood? The papers all said that you had been killed."

"Yes, it is really I," Roland replied. "I have wanted so much to come to see you since then. I wanted to tell you I was not dead, for I believed you might care a little—that you would be glad I was alive. Are you?"

"Why, of course," answered Lydia, her eyes on the ground.

"But I couldn't come," continued the detective, "because I didn't want anybody to know I was alive. You see, I haven't caught my man yet."

"Oh, I hope you catch him!" exclaimed the girl.

"Thank you."

"And my brother does, too."

"How is your brother? I should like to see him. Give him my regards."

This meeting seemed to give Roland renewed vigor and hope. He was in this frame of mind when, the next morning, he received the following communication:

"There is to be a Beauty Competition at the Coliseum tomorrow night I challenge you to be there—both of us disguised. We will try to discover one another

"Tigris."

So it was "Tigris," then, just as he had thought. Oh, if he could only catch this monster of crime! How quickly he would go to Lydia then and tell her he loved her, and ask her brother for her hand!

Disguised as a middle-aged man with light, bushy side-whiskers and a moustache, Roland went to the Coliseum. The evening was nearly over and he had seen no one whom he could feel sure was "Tigris."

As he was about to leave a dancing girl began to dance. Not being very well able to get through the crowd, Roland stopped near her. In her dancing she moved first toward one man and then another. Then, taking a glass of wine from a nearby table she danced up to Roland and thrust the glass against his lips. So suddenly was this done that he was not able to prevent a drop of the wine passing his lips. When he turned to see the girl again, she was gone, and her companions with her.

Before five minutes had passed, Roland knew what had been done. The wine was drugged and he was beginning to feel the effect of it. He sought for the police inspector, but before he could find him, the floor was rocking and a dozen dacing girls were whirling through his brain. The next thing he knew he was comfortably in his own bed.

The next morning he was told that he had been captured, but the police inspector had arrived just in time to rescue him: Tigris and his fellows had, however, escaped.

A week passed before Roland knew what step to take next. He was passing a public house on an out-of-the-way street, when just by chance he saw the chauffeur who drove the mysterious car come from the inn. Quickly Roland went to his home and put on a disguise to resemble this man. To his surprise and delight, when he entered the place he saw the figure of a man that he had come to know as Tigris. There was little use to become acquainted with his face.

Watching this man as a cat a mouse, the detective saw him descend some stairs in a very dark corner.

Then Roland's attention became fixed upon the innkeeper. Going to the counter, he threw a coin up into the air so that it fell on the other side. The proprietor stooped to get it, and in that time Roland was behind the bar with a cloth saturated with chloroform held to the old man's nose.

After a brief struggle he quietly went to sleep, and Roland took his jacket and apron and rapidly and deftly changed his own disguise.

There was much noise and drinking and little notice was taken of anything, so long as the people were served promptly.

In the midst of the noise, Roland was able to telephone for the police in a way that attracted no attention. When he hung up the receiver he knew that the supreme moment had come. It was either he or Tigris this time.

Shuffling from the room as the old innkeeper, he descended a narrow, dark staircase into a cellar. At the bottom he heard a faint sound of voices. He made his way in that direction to a solid, plain door. Here he tapped lightly. A question was asked and he answered in the innkeeper's cracked voice that it was he. The door opened and he went in without further question.

But someone was keener than Roland had anticipated, and one exclamation turned the whole gang onto him. With a blow the light was extinguished and the place was like a cave.

Short as the time had been since Roland entered, he had not been idle. He had seen a door other than the one through which he came. So, fastening his still lighted pipe to a chair back as a target for the flying bullets, he crept along the wall and reached the door. He opened it and went through, closing it behind him. By the aid of a match he found his way through still another door into a dimly lighted passage.

But someone was coming. The detective stood at bay. One of the gang sprang through the door, saw Roland and fired. That shot went wild, but the detective answered it with one which did not, and the man lay at his feet.

It was but the work of a minute to change the places of this man's coat and the innkeeper's jacket and apron. Then, with his disguise off and his face covered with the dead man's mask, he felt reasonably safe again, for as the man lay face downward in the dim light, no one would be the wiser.

As the detective stood waiting for what he knew must come in a short while, he heard crashing and firing and muffled cries of "police."

A man rushed into the passage where Roland stood. He knew that it was Tigris. He wore the same clothes that he had worn when he entered the inn, but he was without disguise save for the black mask which covered his entire face.

"At last," he said with relief, as he looked at the figure on the floor. Then, "Come, I'll lead you to safety. We are in no danger if we are quick."

Roland followed. They went through a long passageway which ended at a door leading directly into the city's sewers. Down the steps Tigris went unhesitatingly, and into the water. Roland followed, determined to stick to him to the end.

Like one who was used to it, Tigris waded through the rushing water. It seemed to Roland they had been in there for hours and had gone many miles, when at last Tigris led the way into a little elevator, seemingly one to take the workmen up and down. Up, up, up they went, the enemies side by side, their bodies touching.

At last the car stopped. Tigris listened a moment and then opened the door.

"Come in," he said to his companion, "this is my home." He pulled off his mask as he spoke.

"You!" gasped Roland.

Before him stood Lablanc, and they were standing in that gentleman's library.

A movement near the door caused both men to turn. There stood Lydia, wide-eyed and dumb with horror.

"I must reveal myself, too, Monsieur Lablanc. I think the game is ended at last," said Roland, taking off his mask.

"Oh, tell me, tell me what this means," cried Lydia, coming forward. "It cannot be what it seems. Oh, Monsieur Roland, you have made a mistake; this cannot be true. Tell me it is not."

Roland could not answer her. He looked at Lablanc.

"Lydia," said the brother, "Monsieur Roland is not mistaken. He does not speak because he can only tell you the truth and he knows the truth would hurt you cruelly. I am beaten at last. I own it, Roland. But for the sake of this innocent girl, let me take justice into my own hands."

Lydia sank weeping into a chair. Roland leaned over her, torn between his desire to comfort here in the only way he could—by promising not to give her brother up—and his duty to hand over to the law the man who for years had been the terror of Paris.

A sharp, quick noise brought them both to their feet. In the place where Lablanc had stood there yawned a square opening. Upon looking through, Roland saw that the famed and much feared Tigris need be feared no more. He took Lydia's hands in his and looked into her eyes. She understood and did not check the grateful tears when he said:

"The world need never know."

THE LURE OF THE LORELEI

Two-Reel Gaumont Hand-Colored

"An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." The ancient Biblical saying is worked out in the above beautiful release in a manner so remarkable that only silence, a silence filled with the conviction of justice, responds to the sad but wonderfully effective finale of the pictured story, "The Lure of the Lorelei."

It is the story of an adventuress who ruthlessly uses her charms as a fatal lure to men, dragging them down to the very depths of despair and degradation, stripping them of their manliness, consuming their forces, physical, mental and financial.

The young cavalry officer, Raoul Champlain, of the time of

SCENE FROM "THE LURE OF THE LORELEI"

Sharply his sword rasped against the steel of his rival, and so it was for this he had with black draped the heart of his mother—had brought to her bier, his fiance!

Louis XVI of France, falls in love with the woman, is lured by her sensuous song, and falls a victim to her charms. In the wake of his allurement his fiancée dies of a broken heart. He is repulsed by the adventuress when she finds someone else who suits better, but when the young officer returns to his first love he finds her being escorted to her burial, his mother walking beside the bier. The mother, finding a letter from the adventuress asking her son for a beautiful and costly jewel, goes to the adventuress and demands that she release her son from her talons. The mother, desperate at being insulted by the woman, flashes a dagger, and in an instant the wicked charmer lies dead at her feet.

The coloring of this film is most beautiful—marvelously so. It is without question one of the most beautiful films that we have yet seen.

INAUGURATION OF THE PRESIDENT

Kinemacolor at Fourteenth Street Theatre

John Wesley Rosenquest and his son, Bert, beat the record today, Wednesday, March 5th, by showing in Kinemacolor the inaugural ceremonies at Washington, less than twenty-four hours after the actual occurrence. We saw the first picture, the first print of this event on the screen, at 2:30 o'clock, which was indeed an event to be proud of. The colors show up in good relief, and are more than excellent considering the climatic conditions of Washington on a March day.

DEATH OF FLORENCE BARKER

It is with deep regret that we acquaint our readers with the death of a most charming young woman, and a gifted motion picture actress, Florence Barker. Miss Barker died in a Los Angeles hospital on February 15th of pneumonia. Her body will be brought east for burial.

MIATT-PATENTS DEPARTMENT

Recent Inventions, Letters Patent, Trade-Marks, Designs, Copyrights, Etc., Relating to the Art, Digested and Reported Exclusively for the Moving Picture News by Geo. Wm. Miatt, Patent Lawyer and Expert, Temple Court, cor. of Nassau and Beekman Streets, New York City the Patent Office models are no longer required or accepter, nor have they been for the last twenty years, because early in the nineties there was room for little else in the building, even then inadequate for the business of the department, and at the ratio of increase of applications dispensing with models then became a matter of necessity.

But there is a certain exception that proves the rule, and this relates to applications for inventions involving the question of perpetual motion, a problem which is perpetual only in its persistance as an ignis fatuus. In this single exception the examiner in charge of the class to which such applications are relegated insists that a working model be introduced in evidence before the application is given serious consideration, which is equivalent to "laying the motion on the table," as it were. But this requirement never phases the applicant, who is necessarily an egotist, and he invariably promises to convincingly demonstrate "in a week or two," more or less, invariably more in fact, for unlike the feline, he does not come back. Being unable to lift himself by the ears, although ample for the purpose, he subsides, with a big explanatory "If," and one more application fails to eventuate into a patent.

The nearest useful approximation to perpetual motion is the clock built by the elder Drawbaugh which has been running correctly and continuously since 1870—the invisible force being derived electrically from Mother Earth—the clock otherwise requiring no extraneous assistance. The pendulum carries a permanent magnet which oscillates in front of, and is alternately attracted and repelled by, an electro-magnet the wires of which are connected with plates buried in the moist earth—the terrestial battery thus tapped being inexhaustive and never requiring attention.

If business in the Patent Office is any criterion, the tide of prosperity is setting in strong, the current week's issue amounting to 844 patents, and the registration of 141 trade-marks, patents, etc. Of these only 72 patents were issued to foreigners. Germany leading with 32. New York State leads, as usual, with 117 to its credit this time, and Pennsylvania a good second with 87 patents to its credit.

"What would you do if you were a millionaire?" was the question propounded to the little boys of an East Side school the other day, according to the Tribune.

Among several precocious answers was this pertinent and natural one: "I would go to the finest movies every night, also matinees if possible."

Patent No. 1,050,238, to Hugo H. Schneider, of Seattle, Wash., relates to means for recording sound, the principal object being to photographically record the sounds that are associated with motion picture views when photographed. The inventor claims, in a photographic recorder, means for causing longitudinal movement of a photographically sensitive film; a diaphragm mounted to be vibrated by sound waves; a screen connected with the diaphragm to vibrate therewith and arranged to intercept rays of light in a line crossing the film; and another screen fixed to intercept the rays in a line crossing the aforesaid line at an angle, whereby a lighted surface and a shaded surface, parted at a line of undulating curves, are formed, photographically picturing a record of the sound-impelled vibrations of the said diaphragm.

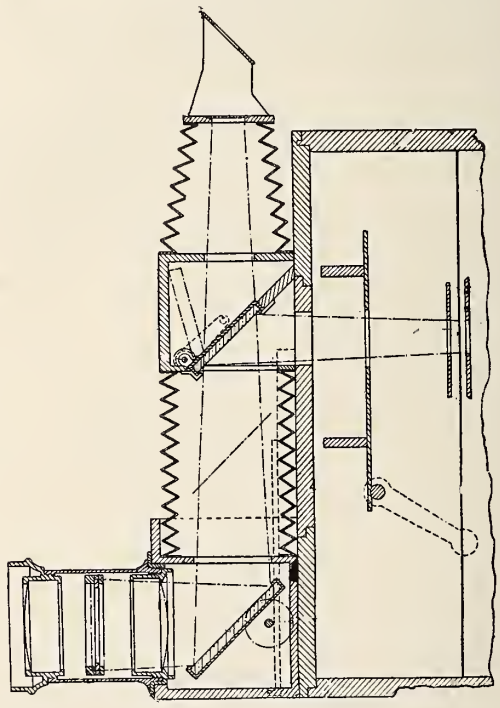
The Moto-picture film is rendering this mundane sphere smaller and less exclusive in many respects, sometimes uncomfortably so, as in the case of the unfortunate who inadvertently made his appearance before the lens and shutter while participating in a parade in a distant city, was recognized in the pictures by the wife he had escaped from ten years before, traced and retrieved in due course. Some one of our legislative luminaries ought to introduce a bill to meet and obviate such contingencies, "reel" dangers and abuses.



Patent No. 1,051,034 to Auguste Vautier-Dufour, of Grandson, Switzerland, relates to a photographic camera which is provided with mirrors which are interposed in the path of the rays of light coming from the objective to the photographic plate or film, in order to allow an objective of great focal length to be employed. These mirrors are arranged so as to allow objectives of different focal lengths to be employed with the same camera. For this purpose, the mirror which receives the rays of light from the objective is placed so that it can be displaced together with the objective in a direction which is parallel to that of the axis of the pencil of the rays of light which are reflected by this mirror and so that it can be moved toward or away from the other mirror in order to produce a variation of the length of the path along which travel the rays of light from the objective to the focusing screen or to the photographic plate or film. This arrangement can, for instance, be advantageously employed for cinematographic cameras.

The inventor claims, in a photographic camera, an objective lens, a compartment to the frame of which the objective lens is secured, a mirror in said compartment, a second compartment slidable within the first compartment, a mirror in said second compartment parallel to the first aforesaid mirror, the light being reflected by said mirrors from the objective lens to a photographic plate or film, a focusing screen, and means for turning back the mirror in the said second compartment to permit the light to reach the said focusing screen.

The United Bifocal Co., of New York City, has been granted registration of "UNITO" as a trade-mark for lenses. Used since January 17, 1912.

The Supreme Court of the United States decided January 6, 1913, in the case of Ubeda v. Zialcita, that one whose registered trade-mark is manifestly an imitation of an earlier but unregistered trade-mark cannot restrain a third party from using it. "Imposition on the public is not a ground on which the plaintiff can come into court but is a good ground for keeping him out." Mr. Justice Holmes delivering the opinion of the Court.

"'Wire you insulate?' asked the wireman's better half as hubby cautiously inserted the latchkey at 2 a.m."—Modern Electrics. And then, the insulation being defective, the wires got crossed and the sparks began to fly.

Patent No. 1,051,567 to Alexander W. Dreyfoos, of Mount Vernon, N. Y., relates to apparatus for photographic printing by artificial light, the objects being to provide a removable shutter, means for adjusting the shutter, and means for automatically controlling the rotation thereof whereby a proper regulation of the printing exposure and distribution of light may be obtained—it being desirable, in order that the prints be uniform and alike in appearance, that the printing exposure, the distribution and the intensity of the light be substantially the same for each copy printed. The inventor claims for the purpose, a housing comprising a printing frame portion, having a hinged cover; a vacuum tube lamp arranged within the housing; an opaque partition between the lamp and the printing frame, said partition having an aperture for the passage to light; an adjustable rotary shutter disposed axially about the said lamp and arranged to close the aperture in said partition during a predetermined part of a revolution of the shutter; means for rotating the shutter; means for controlling the starting of said rotating means, actuated by the closing of the cover upon the frame; and means for automatically controlling the stopping of the rotation of said shutter upon the completion of one revolution thereof.

"Virtue" may be its own reward, but is not registerable as a trade-mark, being, theoretically at least, public property, notwithstanding the fact that individuals frequently claim a monopoly or seek to form a trust.

Mona Lisa's famous smile will broaden into a grin if in her enforced seclusion she becomes cognizant of the fact that $38,000 is a knock-down price for a moto-picture film. Truly "Quo Vadis."

The Skyrocket Camera is not the precipitate invention its name might imply, but is the result of some twelve years of experimental investigation. It is designed mainly for military purposes, and carries a gyroscope and a parachute to steady the camera and control its descent. It reaches the highest point of its trajectory, some 2 600 feet, in eight seconds, when the shutter is released and the photograph of underlying topography taken, after which it makes a leisurely descent, landing gently in about fifteen minutes after reaching the apex of its ambition. It is not yet adapted to moto-picture work, the positioning pace being a little too erethistic for even our most previous operators, but we presume automatic intermittent exposure apparatus might be successfully substituted for the human crank.

Patent No. 1,051,424, issued to Albert E. Lipp, of Philadelphia, Pa., is for certain improvements in Photographic Printing Devices, the objects of the invention being to provide a novel, simple and efficient printing device whereby light may be thoroughly diffused before passing through the negative in making photographic prints under conditions requiring a thorough diffusion of the light, such for example, as the conditions under which vignetted photographic prints are made; to provide a novel means whereby the printing paper may be rapidly applied to and removed from the device; to provide a novel means for holding negatives in different positions relatively to the paper holding devices and to the vignetting devices; and to provide a novel means for quickly changing the vignetting devices to meet various requirements. The device consists of a frame having an opening therein, a contact board movable toward and from said opening, clamping means for said board, a negative support outwardly of said board and having a negative engaging face movable toward and from said frame, and a spring having one part secured to said frame and another part secured to said support and pressing said face toward said frame and guiding said support when moved toward or from said frame.

Berlin has an association, recently organized by prominent representatives of art, science, officialdom and commerce, for the study of cinematography. It will endeavor to raise the standard of the ordinary films and also to further the production of films of an instructive and scientific nature. If the regular producers fear that films of the nature desired will not be profitable, the association will itself bring about their production. It is also to further the establishment of a cinematograph museum and archives for the preservation of especially valuable films.

We shall be pleased to answer pertinent questions propounded by readers of the Moving Picture News.

THE EDISON KINETOPHONE

On February 17th, Thos. A. Edison's latest invention, the Kinetophone or Talking Pictures were given to the public simultaneously in four theatres in New York and two in Chicago. Since that time, machines have been installed in Boston, Buffalo, Providence, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Milwaukee, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and the managers of all houses report that the amount of business done has exceeded all previous records, standing room having been at a premium. It can be safely said that never in the history of the picture business has anything met with such generous approbation and approval as the Edison talking pictures. Sixty men are now on the road rapidly installing machines in the largest cities in the United States and Canada. Men have also been sent to Great Britain, Australia, China and South Africa. It is the purpose of the distributors to open up in all largest cities and largest theatres, and gradually work into the smaller towns and theatres. The talking picture belongs in the moving picture houses, and that is where it will eventually be located. The idea of first introducing it in vaudeville as were the first pantomime pictures, is, in this way, they have been rapidly shown in all sections which would permit the motion picture managers to witness the Kinetophone without having to travel to New York. It is the intention of the distributors to supply machines to the motion picture theatres immediately after the large houses have been equipped.

The success of the Kinetophone was so much greater than anticipated by the Edison Company that arrangements were not adequate. There are, at present, however, working three shifts of men twenty-four hours of the day in an effort to meet the demands.

While the Kinetophone is proving so remarkable a success in vaudeville, its natural home is in the picture houses, where it competes only with the silent drama and not with the living actor.

Practically, every publication of any consequence in the United States has devoted columns to this wonderful achievement. Exhaustive magazine articles have been written, and the daily papers from coast to coast have given large space and prominent positions in enthusiastic praise.

There have been many previous attempts at synchronizing the phonograph and motion pictures, and there are many inventions in the patent office for that purpose. Most of these ideas are based upon synchronizing after the pictures are made, which, according to Edison, is merely an incident, he claiming that the sound and sight must be in perfect synchronism when taken and that no possible device can obtain synchronism that does not originally exist. The Edison pictures are taken at the Bronx Studios, the actor performing exactly as he does on the dramatic stage, his every sound and every action being taken simultaneously, therefore, in perfect synchronism. The same device is used in projecting the phonograph, dictating the subject on which the film is to be operated. The synchronizing device which is attached to the Kinetoscope prevents the operator from turning its crank at greater speed than that of the phonograph. After the novelty of the talking pictures is worn off, the question of subjects will be an important one. It is the intention of the distributors to provide subjects that will cause the audience to overlook the fact that they are witnessing the mechanical production and devote their entire interest to the subject. Many prominent stars have already been engaged, and the headline acts of vaudeville will be offered at frequent intervals. Selections from the big Broadway dramatic and operatic successes will be made and sent broadcast, ahead of the regular road shows. The talking pictures are not limited to subject matter as are the pantomime pictures, as it is possible to do everything that is on the dramatic stage, and in many cases the aid of the phonograph eclipses the dramatic performance. For instance, this week in the New York theatres the picture, "Faust," is being run. In this picture, the Kinetophone not only produces the intensive dramatic lines of Mephisto, but shows the transformation of Faust from an old man to youth. It also shows the vision of Marguerite and the vision of the cross. Mephisto appears out of space in a cloud of smoke, and is not shot up through a trap door in the crude manner used in the drama.

When one stops to consider that this one subject contains double exposures and stop work, and that records must be operated in unison with the film, he forms a better conception of the possibilities of the invention.

There will, indeed, spring up in rapid succession many so-called talking pictures on account of the success of Edison's Kinetophone. It must be remembered, however, that the Edison plant is the only one in the world having complete equipment with experts in every department for the manufacture of motion picture machines, films, phonographs and records, and that Mr. Edison is the logical man to combine the two inventions. In addition to this, their studio facilities are unexcelled. Their excellent stock company will be augmented by talent selected by the distributors.

Competition secures the most perfect results, and full competition is invited, from all sources of the world of synchronizing devices, and if it spurs the trade to obtain the most perfect machines and records the whole industry will, perforce, benefit thereby.

HIAWATHA

Have the Indians any dramatic instinct? If so, why do the producers of Indian subjects always use white actors to play Indian roles? The first question has been answered in Mr. F. E. Moore's production of Hiawatha shown in four beautiful reels of moving pictures. The grimaces of the white actor are so out of keeping in depicting Indian deportment, that having seen Hiawatha the others are ludicrous, almost ridiculous. From his infancy the Indian was taught to make an impenetrable mask of his face, hiding joy and sorrow, pleasure and pain from the rude gaze of the world. To show him grinding his teeth as if in impotent rage is to show something he never did. The Indian players in Hiawatha give us back the noble red man, with his wild grace, the grace that comes from lack of self-consciousness, with the dignity that close contact of nature gives. He lives and moves with the freedom of wild things, and yet he is dominated by high ideals.
